Perhaps it would be useful if I gave some background both to the parole system, as my hon. Friend made a number of remarks on the way that it is working now, and on Mr. Cannon's case. All prisoners serving determinate sentences of more than a year are eligible for parole. Their parole eligibility date marks the earliest date on which they can be released on licence if the parole board so recommends. It is important to remember that no one may be released early on licence without a positive recommendation either from the local review committee acting on behalf of the Parole Board, or from the Parole Board itself. A prisoner becomes eligible for parole either when he has served one third of his sentence—taking into account any time spent on remand—or six months after the sentence has been passed, whichever is later. That is, I think, an essential part of the misunderstanding which clearly exists in this case.

Mr. Cannon was remanded by Havering magistrates court on 5 August 1987; committed by it on 10 November 1987; and tried at the Central Criminial court and sentenced on 26 October 1988 to four years' imprisonment for conspiracy to supply class A controlled drugs. Mr. Cannon's parole eligibility date was calculated to be 26 April 1989. As hon. Members will readily calculate, this means that in Mr. Cannon's case, his PED was six months after the start of his sentence, rather than one third the way through.

All cases are considered first by the local review committee or LRC as it is commonly called, at the prison where the inmate is held. The timing of the LRC meeting depends on the length of the sentence. Generally, for sentences of up to two years, the LRC will consider the case about eight weeks before PED. For longer sentence cases—and Mr. Cannon's case falls in this class—the review is generally held three and a half to four months before that date.

There are two objectives to these timing arrangements. First, to maximise the time available for observation and reporting in the establishment before the parole review. Perhaps I could remind my hon. Friend that parole review is definitely not re-sentencing. The parole selection procedure is based not merely on the evidence and reports available to the judge at the time of sentencing. In addition, a large number of reports on the prisoner drawn from a number of sources are prepared—from prison officers in various parts of the prison who may come into contact with the prisoner in his daily life; prison governing staff; prison medical staff; chaplains; prison probation staff; and importantly, a home circumstance report prepared by a probation officer from the probation service which would offer supervision in the event of early release on licence. These reports take some time to prepare and it is only fair that they are based on a reasonable period of observation. It is for this reason that we allow six months as a very minimum time in which to prepare and consider the reports.

The second objective is to allow sufficient time for the rest of the selection procedure to be followed and for the establishment to be notified of the parole decision in sufficient time for the inmate to be released on the parole eligibility date, or its anniversary, if parole is granted. In Mr. Cannon's case, the LRC at Wandsworth considered the reports on 9 February 1989, just over 11 weeks before his PED.

Mr. Cannon's offence did not fall in those categories of cases which can be decided on the advice of the local review committee alone. It was therefore referred to the Parole Board for a further review. Mr. Cannon's case was considered by the board on 2 June 1989. As my hon. Friend will know, the Parole Board did not find Mr. Cannon suitable for early release on licence; and accordingly the Home Secretary had no power to grant parole. Notification of this decision was sent to Swaleside prison where Mr. Cannon was then located on 12 June; and he was informed accordingly.

Naturally, Mr. Cannon was disappointed with the outcome of this parole review. He has drawn to my hon. Friend's attention the fact that he is a "prison trusty" allowed out on home leave and yet denied parole. Hon. Members will be aware that although an inmate's behaviour in prison is one of the factors considered by the Parole Board, other aspects are also reviewed. The Parole Board regularly publishes its criteria for parole selection in its annual report. It considers each case carefully under six headings. The first is the nature of the offence. The Parole Board has due regard to the public's concern about early release of inmates already convicted of offences of violence or those which jeopardise public safety. Although each case is considered individually, cases involving trafficking in drugs such as heroin are bound to cause concern.

The second heading relates to an inmate's criminal and other history. The incidence and frequency of previous offending, having regard to the nature of offences, is used as a guide to the probability of reoffending. Obviously, many previous convictions indicate, in the absence of other factors, a high probability of reoffending. Other indicators of this are persistent offending since an early age, short intervals at liberty between convictions and a record of employment which is poor in terms of the quality of the jobs and the lengths of continuous employment. If an inmate has previously been under the supervision of the probation service, his response to that may be relevant to his likely response to parole supervision. I have no doubt that the Parole Board will have reviewed Mr. Cannon particularly carefully under this heading.

The third category is prison behaviour and response to treatment. As I have said, the main bulk of the dossier will consist of reports by various prison officials who know the prisoner well. These reports build up a picture of what the prisoner has done and in what light he has shown himself since his conviction. In general, bad conduct in prison is a factor against parole and good conduct a favourable factor. But many recidivists are well experienced at playing the system, so prison behaviour—which may have little bearing on behaviour outside the prison walls—has to be regarded in light of other factors.

The fourth heading is medical considerations. In this case, where Mr. Cannon's offence involved drugs, medical reports will be of crucial importance as regards the chances of the prisoner reoffending and the possible gravity of further offences.

Fifthly, the inmate's home circumstances and employment prospects on release are considered. Home circumstances and employment prospects can be critical for success on parole. A good home, a job to go to and the absence of the circumstances and temptations which led to the earlier crime are factors favourable to parole.

The sixth and final heading is co-operation with parole supervision. The supervision of a parolee by a probation officer during the parole period is an essential part of the parole scheme. It is always difficult to be sure about this. However, a previous failure on parole or a failure on probation may make co-operation doubtful.

Each case is carefully considered against these criteria. For this reason there is no mileage in comparing Mr. Cannon's case with those of any co-defendants. The Parole Board will consider each individual's circumstances. Mr. Cannon has drawn my hon. Friend's attention to his good prisoner behaviour. I am sure that the Parole Board will have taken that into account. It will also have taken into account his criminal record—and I should have liked to have given the House an account of that——

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I accept what my hon. Friend is saying but as I said at the outset, I am not arguing that he should have been given parole at that review. The point that I was making—and the point that Mr. Jennings made strongly to me in the letter from which I quoted—was that one reason why the parole review board might have turned down his original application was on the understanding that he could have another. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would address that point.

Mr. Lloyd: I have partly addressed that point and will return to it. As this is part of a continuing exchange, it is worth making it clear that the Parole Board makes its own decisions, which the Home Secretary and myself can in no way alter. If the circumstances of which my hon. Friend's constituent has complained are such that he is surprised at the result, that must be part of my reply.

It is an important part of my reply to show that on the information that is available to me the result is not at all surprising. However, I accept what my hon. Friend says and I hope that he will accept that there is nothing about the background of the case that makes the Parole Board's decision in the least bit surprising.

I am satisfied that Mr. Cannon's case was considered thoroughly and carefully by the Parole Board, and, alas, he must serve until his earliest date of release, which at present is 2 April 1990, as my hon. Friend said.

But although Mr. Cannon is serving a four-year sentence, during which he might normally have expected a second review, he does not qualify for a further review. The local review committee rules provide that an inmate is not eligible for a further statutory parole review unless there is a period of 16 months or more between the previous local review committee review and the earliest date of release.

In Mr. Cannon's case, owing to the time that he spent on remand from 10 November 1987 to 25 October 1988, he was required to serve the full six months minimum qualifying period before his parole eligibility date. That was the point that I made at the beginning of my remarks and where the root of the misunderstanding probably lies.

The local review committee review may take place only up to four months earlier than that date. For Mr. Cannon, that meant that the very first date on which his case might have been eligible for local review committee consideration would have been 26 December 1988. Even at this relatively late hour, those hon. Members who are present will readily be able to appreciate that Boxing day 1988 was less than 16 months before the earliest date of release of 2 April 1990. I recognise that it falls short by a mere three weeks, but I am sure that my hon. Friend will appreciate that the line must be drawn somewhere. Mr. Cannon's local review committee review actually took place on 9 February, just under 14 months before his earliest date of release. But if it had happened at the earliest point that it could have done, he would still not have been eligible for a second one.

I am aware that fine footwork is involved in the timing of parole reviews, and decisions about the eligibility of second and subsequent reviews are not an easy matter to understand, particularly at this time of night. I appreciate how difficult it must be for Mr. Cannon and his family and my hon. Friend to accept the Parole Board's decision and to know that because of the time that he spent on remand he is not eligible for a further review.

I am also sorry that it should have take so long to complete the first review. Here I come to one of my hon. Friend's major points. The delays that have plagued the parole system are a sad reflection on the increasing number of cases and, until recently, the inability of the Home Office parole unit to keep pace. But I reject my hon. Friend's suggestion that the system is breaking down. It is plagued by heavy delays, but within those delays it works effectively. Parole delays cause unnecessary anxiety to inmates and their families and lead to problems for the staff in the prisons. They are unacceptable and we have taken some firm steps to eliminate them. We have reorganised the parole unit, streamlined procedures and authorised and recruited additional staff. The Home Secretary has appointed additional members to the Parole Board and the board is considering additional cases at each panel sitting. We took those measures several months ago, but already they are beginning to bear fruit.

We are now seeing the first signs of real improvement and there are no longer any significant delays on cases that do not go the Parole Board but stay with the local review committees, but there are still some delays with the Parole Board. I am sure that the worst of the delays are now being eliminated and we are considering what further changes and reforms are needed to reduce those delays still further and then eliminate them altogether. I am sure that that will be achieved, if not this year, certainly during the first half of next year. That is our intention.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this difficult case. I shall look at the letter from Mr. Jennings, to which he referred, and follow it back to its source. But on the timing of the review and on the decision that there is no opportunity under the rules for a second review, the letters that I and my predecessor have sent to my hon. Friend are correct. But I realise that the situation is complex.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-one minutes to Two o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 27 October 1989
The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am going to take petitions first.

PETITIONS

Football (Identity Cards)

9.34 am

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I have a petition from the Football Supporters Association of the east midlands and other football supporters, and the signatures on it have been collected from places as far apart as Boston, Leicester, Derby, Nottingham and all the counties of the east midlands. The petition states:

We condemn the proposed legislation to force football supporters to carry identification cards, and we believe that a system of identity cards will have little impact on the problems of football—related violence, will hinder football's attempts to attract a new generation of supporters and will lead to the eventual demise of the game as a spectator sport.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your hon. House will urge the Government to bring forward proposals which have the support of genuine football supporters.

On behalf of those genuine football supporters, I have pleasure in presenting the petition to the House. Let the Government take note.

To lie upon the Table

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am taking petitions first.

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): I, too, wish to present a humble petition by football supporters, which brings the total number of signatures to the petition to over 430,000 which, I think, makes it the third largest petition since the war. The House will be interested to know that that represents almost exactly the gate at every football club in the country on a Saturday afternoon.

The petition says that the proposed Football Spectators Bill will cause total chaos at the turnstiles to legitimate spectators entering football grounds and will impose unacceptable restrictions upon the liberties of law-abiding subjects and place unacceptable costs upon such supporters. As with the other petitions, this one states:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your hon. House will urge the Government to bring forward proposals which will have the support of genuine football supporters. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: There is one more petition.

Student Loans

9.38 am

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I wish to present a petition organised by the students of Goldsmiths' college in my constituency and signed by David Anteh, 7 Malpas road, Brockley and 1,200 others. The petition states:

The humble petition of citizens and students of Great Britain and Northern Ireland showeth that any proposals to introduce the payment by students of tuition fees and student loans, whether partially or fully, will further limit access to higher education. Wherefore your petitioners pray that your hon. House do reject any proposals to introduce the payment by students of tuition fees or student loans and your petitioners in duty bound will ever pray etc.

The petitioners fear, as I do, that student loans will seriously limit access to——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must not make a speech on this matter. She must present her petition now please.

Ms. Ruddock: This matter is of concern to the students and staff of Goldsmiths' college because that college has equal opportunities for women, black students and part-time students, all of whom would be disproportionately affected by the Government's proposals. I am pleased to present this petition on their behalf.

To lie upon the Table.

Points of Order

Mr. Speaker: I shall now take points of order.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): In view of the uncertainty and confusion in the international money markets, Mr. Speaker, have you had any indication from the new Chancellor of the Exchequer about a statement on the economic situation?

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): They are paying his wages.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is intolerable to have background conversations going on when I am listening to a point of order.

Dr. Owen: I should have thought that it was in the interests of all hon. Members that we should hear about any new Government economic initiative, such as a change in the base rate or a change in policy towards sterling, not through the press but here in the House. Therefore, it seems reasonable to ask you whether you have had any indication of the Government's intention to make a statement in the House.

Mr. Speaker: I shall deal with one matter at a time. I have had no such information. Normally I should receive notification before 10 o'clock.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is an important issue. While you have not had notification of that, the Opposition did not have notification that two Bills were to be guillotined this week. That causes us anxiety. First, the Government should come to the House as an urgent priority to sort out the enormous chaos caused by the squabbling between Nos. 10 and 11 Downing street. Secondly, at least on this occasion, the Government should give proper notification to the Opposition and on the annunciators so that they cannot slip in a few platitudes in the middle of the debate this morning, but must provide an adequate explanation to the House. I raise this matter because of their conduct—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This matter was raised yesterday. I heard the Leader of the House apologise for the fact that no notice was given. We cannot pursue that matter now. I am sure that in future notice will be given.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You said that you had no information that the Government sought a statement from the new Chancellor of the Exchequer. Will you confirm that, if the new Chancellor is willing and considers it necessary, as many of us do, to make a statement about exchange rate policy, it would still be possible for you to arrange a statement at 11 o'clock if you received notice between now and then, after the Chancellor has seen the response of the British exchange markets to overnight falls in New York?

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Is this the same subject?

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): Yes. In a similar crisis 25 years ago, John Profumo lied to the House. He was asked to come to the House to explain his actions. Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) made a serious allegation that the Prime Minister had misled the House, because at 3.15 pm yesterday she said that the Chancellor had her full support—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ashton: I have not finished my point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I know. The hon. Member made broadly the same point yesterday. We cannot continue with it today. The Front Bench gave the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) the answer.

Mr. Ashton: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I am not asking the Front Bench. It answered the point, but I am putting it to you. Despite the Prime Minister misleading the House at 3.15 yesterday afternoon—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman makes that kind of allegation, he should write to me, because it is a matter of privilege. I will not have that allegation made in the Chamber today.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On 19 October the Home Secretary said in a statement on the Guildford and Woolwich pub bombings:

"the four persons involved will be eligible to apply to me for compensation under the provisions of section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. The amount of the compensation will be determined by an independent assessor."—[Official Report, 19 October 1989; Vol. 158, c. 273.]

Yesterday, at Question Time, the Home Secretary said:

"But I hope that Opposition Members, in their pursuit of this matter, will take into account the fact that the people who suffered most from it were not those who were wrongfully imprisoned, but those who were murdered at Guildford."—[Official Report, 26 October 1989; Vol. 158, c. 1035.]

My point of order is that the Home Secretary made it clear in his statement that the four had been wrongfully imprisoned, that the convictions were quashed and that, as there had been a miscarriage of justice, the four could apply to him for compensation. Yesterday, however, he seemed to go some way from accepting the decision of the Court of Appeal, prejudicing their right to compensation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. No—this is a matter of argument between the hon. Member—and perhaps other hon. Members—and the Home Secretary. It is not a matter of order for the Chair. I said yesterday—the whole House must accept and recognise this—that I cannot be held responsible for answers given, provided that they are in order. The Home Secretary's answer was in order.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order for you is that the House is being denied access to information. Clearly, the Government and the former Chancellor of the Exchequer had access yesterday and previously to the Treasury's autumn forecasts. Setting aside Walters and all the rest of it, those forecasts were the basis of the ex-Chancellor's decision yesterday. Will the House be allowed to see that information, so that we can know the true extent of the economic catastrophe and of what happened yesterday?

Mr. Speaker: That is a spurious point of order, even for a Friday morning.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I wonder whether you could assist me, Mr. Speaker. I understand that you have one particularly strong, peculiar and far-reaching power, which is not often exercised, but which you share with my wife. You have the ability to section a Member whom you feel is probably bordering on insanity. I think that you should move directly to No. 10 Downing street, as clearly there is a candidate there for your exercise of that power.

Mr. Speaker: I was chosen by the House to be the Speaker. Let us move on.

Football Spectators Bill [Lords] [Ways and Means]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Football Spectators Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise the payment into the Consolidated Fund of any fees received by the Secretary of State under the Act—[Mr. Moynihan.]

9.45 am

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): This ways and means resolution should not pass without comment. It is a narrow resolution which was made available to Members only this morning. It should have been provided earlier in the week, as is the custom. The Government have been thrown into chaos by the huge diversion in economic policy between the former Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister's croney, who was employed at the taxpayers expense to the tune of £50,000 a year—at least there had been some saving to taxpayers—so it is understandable that the Government have not been able to issue the resolution earlier for Members' consideration.

The resolution relates to clause 10(2) of the Bill:

"An application for a licence in respect of any premises shall be made in such manner, in such form and accompanied by such fee as may be detemined by the Secretary of State."

That is a wide power. The Secretary of State has absolute power to determine the fee, the manner and the form in which the fee shall be levied. Will the Minister give an account of what scale of fees he has in mind? As has been demonstrated by the number of petitions presented this morning, there is widespread anxiety among football supporters and clubs about the scheme, which will involve football clubs in expenditure. I want that assurance from the sports Minister today.

Unfortunately, it seems that the fees will not be listed in a statutory instrument. The primary legislation gives the Secretary of State the power to levy the fees, so this is the only opportunity that we shall have specifically to discuss the fees. The Minister now has a useful opportunity to tell the House whether he will bear in mind the position of football clubs so that some of the marginal clubs are not driven out of existence.

Some football league clubs are in a good financial position. They are wealthy and powerful. But that does not apply to all clubs. Several clubs are struggling for survival. This wretched football identity scheme will create more problems for such clubs, so the Secretary of State should take into account their financial position and the effect of fees on them. Will the Minister give that assurance?

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cryer: I shall finish my point. We want an assurance that, in applying the power that we grant to him, the Secretary of State will take into account the financial position of clubs, if necessary levying only a nominal fee, and that he will not regard this power as a means of raising revenue. The resolution requires that the fees be paid into the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. Vaz: Does my hon. Friend agree with me and other members of the Committee which considered the Football Spectators Bill that, as the Taylor inquiry has not yet produced a report, the best course of action would be to withdraw the motion and the Bill until we have the final report from Lord Justice Taylor?

Mr. Cryer: That would be an extremely sensible course of action. The Government promised that they would be able to take into account the results of the Taylor inquiry as the Bill progressed through Committee, but that was patently not the case. I expect the Government to give solid, cast-iron assurances to the House about the level of fees that they will levy. I hope that the assurances are rather stronger than those which were given to the House about taking into account the results of the Taylor inquiry.

One of the problems with ministerial assurances, although I continue to look for them as they provide the only opportunity that we have to obtain assurances in respect of ways and means motions, is that, at a time of Government chaos of the sort that we have seen over the past 24 hours, Ministers can move with amazing rapidity. For example, only yesterday at 6 pm the right hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington) was the Government Chief Whip. By about 7 pm, he was the Home Secretary.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying far from the ways and means motion. I know that he appreciates that it is a narrow motion.

Mr. Cryer: Indeed, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I am saying that I am seeking assurances about the level of fees that will be levied. The difficulty is that the Minister for Sport can be changed. I shall welcome the assurances that I hope he will give, but he could disappear tomorrow. An alteration should be made so that a system of fees and safeguards is set out in the Bill, and the fees should take into account the financial position of clubs. That would be of great advantage to the House. It might be to the advantage of everyone, including the Government, if it is borne in mind when legislation is being drafted that the Prime Minister sacks people at a minute's notice and exercises arbitrary, chaotic and arrogant power.

9.53 am

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) for filling the void by catching the eye of Mr. Speaker while we were waiting for the Minister to explain the proposal that is before us. We have been considering the Bill for a long time and it is unfortunate that we never get any explanation from the Government. As my hon. Friend says, they continue with their proposals to levy licence fees and other unacceptable charges. At the end of the day, the burden will fall on innocent spectators and not on the clubs. It will fall also on the Consolidated Fund. It is outrageous that the motion is on the Order Paper. We are proceeding with a measure to tax football and also, possibly, to impose further expenditure upon Government funds. It is entirely inappropriate and, in my view, foolhardy.

It is a matter of major importance that, following one of the most horrendous catastrophes witnessed in British society for a long time—the Hillsborough disaster—the Government found it necessary to appoint one of the most eminent judges in the land to hold an inquiry. We know before we have his report that extremely serious matters will have to be discussed following his pronouncements. All these matters will bear on the licence fees that are likely to be levied on football clubs throughout the country, and we know that we cannot have the Taylor report before December.

We cannot have a debate, which we have been promised, before January, which is half a football season away. Yet the Government choose to proceed with powers to set up a licensing authority, which will have the right to charge without any appeal being possible. They are giving a licensing authority the power of taxation without representation before the Football Spectators Bill is on the statute book. In effect, they are implementing the measure now.

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): Come on, Denis.

Mr. Howell: It is perfectly true.

It is ludicrous that any Government should proceed before the Lord Justice of Appeal whom they appointed has pronounced upon their schemes—[Interruption.] May I say to the Minister——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It would be helpful to the right hon. Gentleman who has the Floor if there were not so much cross-talk across the Chamber.

Mr. Howell: Thank you very much, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The object of the ways and means motion is to give the licensing authority the power to charge. When the Minister considers the events at Hillsborough and when he asks himself whether there will be additional difficulties at the turnstiles when the identity scheme is imposed, he should ask himself also what would have been the consequences if the scheme had been in operation at Hillsborough on the day of the disaster.

It is inconceivable that Lord Justice Taylor will say anything other than that the Bill is nonsensical and, furthermore, a danger to public safety. I have no doubt that he will say that it should be withdrawn. That is not a far-fetched hypothesis but one that is based on reality. The Government's decision to allow the licensing authority to be set up and to impose fees on football in circumstances that mean that we might not have a scheme at all is crass stupidity of an order that very few of us have seen before. That is an additional reason—[Interruption.] Conservative Members are laughing. I suppose that this week they have seen more crass stupidity than most of my right hon. and hon. Friends can evisage.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): My right hon. Friend has referred to the problems associated with Hillsborough and the report that is being prepared by Lord Justice Taylor. Is he aware that there were great problems at the Conservative party conference when the breakdown of a computer meant that many Conservative Members were denied access? There was no violence outside the conference centre, but inside——

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The intervention by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is far removed from the speech of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell).

Mr. Tony Banks: I was merely pointing out, Madam Deputy Speaker, that the same problem could arise with the implementation of a football membership scheme.

Mr. Howell: I shall take up my hon. Friend's point, and I hope that I shall be able to do so within the rules of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman must remain within the rules of order.

Mr. Howell: I quite agree, Madam Deputy Speaker, and the rules of order bear on the expenditure which can be forced on clubs unnecessarily, which I am sure you will appreciate.

The ways and means motion is being imposed upon us 24 hours after the Minister for Sport has changed the rules of the game. When, in Committee, we sought to introduce some pilot schemes, he said that that could not be done. When we sought to exempt certain divisions, he said that that could not be done.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): The Minister is not listening.

Mr. Howell: The Minister never listens, so that does not worry me. If he does listen, he does not comprehend, which is even worse.

Only a day ago the Minister solemnly announced—not to the House as he should have done today—but in a press statement:

"Electronic turnstiles will be tested before identity cards."

The Minister is seeking powers to set up a licensing authority and the Ways and Means resolution will give that authority power to charge, yet he now tells us that he does not know whether the arrangements will work and whether the scheme will be practicable; we are now to have turnstile experiments at two or three grounds.

You, Madam Deputy Speaker, are a great supporter of West Bromwich Albion, which is in your constituency. We know that you appreciate your constituents' devoted support of that team. You have been seen very recently at that very ground. You were seen there only last Saturday, and I am very pleased about that.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howell: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but not in the middle of my fulsome tribute to Madam Deputy Speaker. Madam Deputy Speaker, who goes to West Bromwich Albion, knows what a struggle it has, and that every penny counts. She knows that it is vital that spectators should get into the ground promptly, and no licensing authority should set about its business before Parliament has considered the Taylor report and decided whether the whole nonsensical idea should be scrapped or whether some other scheme should be introduced.

Mr. John Carlisle: I am sorry to interrupt the cosy chat between midlands Labour Members. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Health (Mr. Howell) is misleading the House, as he did throughout Committee stage and on Second Reading, when he says that having introduced the proposals my hon. Friend the Minister for Sport is erring from his original policy. It has always been made perfectly clear—the right hon. Gentleman knows this—that before the scheme is put into operation some sort of experiment has to take place to test the machinery to be used. The right hon. Gentleman will also know that it was proposed that some sort of scheme should be put into operation before the season in which the policy was fully implemented. The right hon. Gentleman is deliberately misleading the House. My hon. Friend's proposals are perfectly in line with all the statements made throughout the passage of the Bill.

Mr. Howell: That is another example of the logic with which we have repeatedly been faced this week. People say, "Everything's all right." When we ask, "In that case, why did the Chancellor resign?" we receive no answer. The hon. Gentleman's intervention belongs to the same perverted logic. The Minister has said throughout that he would not proceed in this way. If he had always intended to proceed in this way, why did he issue the press statement yesterday? He did so because what he proposed was a departure from everything that he had told us in Committee.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): May I clarify two points, because the right hon. Gentleman is going off at a tangent? First, I have made it clear since before the introduction of the Bill that if the Government went ahead with a national membership scheme, we should need to be satisfied that the technology was up and working and correct so that the scheme could be implemented effectively from day one. The testing of that technology will be a matter for the football membership authority, which will examine in detail the appropriate technology and tests. Absolutely nothing has changed on that front. I hope that that assists the right hon. Gentleman.

Moreover, the right hon. Gentleman's comments to the effect that I have issued a presss release on this subject this week is inaccurate.

Mr. Howell: No doubt it was Mr. Bernard Ingham who gave the information to The Times. Perhaps one of his minions at the Department of the Environment told Sheila Gunn and journalists from other newspapers what the Minister wished to convey.

The statement that has been issued is wholly unacceptable to us in any case because the experiment that we are told is to take place while powers of licensing and taxation are being granted will take place over a short period. If the Minister proposes to have an experiment, it should be over a longer period—at least a season. [Interruption.] The Minister says no. Let me tell him. He obviously intends a proper evaluation of the scheme, and to an extent I welcome that, but no such proper evaluation can take place unless we judge the effects of the scheme on normal league games, cup ties and derbies, in mid-week, in good weather and on filthy winter nights. Unless we examine the effect of the scheme in all those circumstances, any evaluation will be worthless. I submit to the House that that is exactly what the scheme is—worthless.

Mr. Norris: The right hon. Gentleman has made a serious allegation. He said that my hon. Friend the Minister had fundamentally changed the rules and changed his policy since our debates in Committee. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman remembers my hon. Friend's words at 11.30 am on Thursday 20 July. He may not have been present, of course, because I know that he had to spend a great deal of time outside the Committee Room briefing his various friends in the press. If he was around at 11.30 am—Hansard conveniently records the fact that it was 11.30 am—he may remember my hon. Friend saying:

> "I said that testing the technology for the scheme would be part of the preparations for implementation. I have also said repeatedly that we shall not go ahead with implementation until we are satisfied that the technology is workable, efficient and safe."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 20 July 1989; c. 503.]

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that not one word of that has changed—that my hon. Friend has done no more than reiterate exactly what he said in July?

Mr. Howell: Judging by the rather offensive comments with which the hon. Gentleman introduced his intervention, we have a potential new Chief Whip staring us in the face. Even at 11.30 pm, we can well understand what the Minister is saying and we can also understand the Bill, which says that it is the business of the Football Membership Authority, not the Minister, to put the scheme in position and to satisfy itself as to the technology.

The very fact that the Minister has decided to have a scheme for testing the equipment before he has even set up the Football Membership Authority shows once and for all that the Bill has nothing to do with setting up an independent body and everything to do with making football subject to the disciplines of the Government—whether it likes it or not.

Mr. Moynihan: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong again—on two counts. First, nobody has spoken about a system of testing being introduced before the football authority is set up. Secondly, this is not a matter for the Football Membership Authority alone because, as the right hon. Gentleman will recall, the Government have given a commitment to the House to the effect that, once the Football Membership Authority is established—subject to the will of Parliament—there will be a further debate in the House on the approval of the scheme by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The prospect of that second important debate was welcomed by the right hon. Gentleman. It will be vital in the light of any findings that Lord Justice Taylor may make and will give Parliament a full opportunity to consider them.

Mr. Howell: The Minister only compounds the confusion. He says that the scheme is the business of the football and licensing authorities, yet before they are even established and have been given an opportunity to decide what action to take, the Minister makes his pronouncement, by one means or another, that he intends to usurp the authorities' powers and judgment and to proceed, which may have the consequence of fees being imposed on football clubs.

I endorse the arguments that have been made about the scheme's technical aspects. We shall welcome an experiment, provided that it is undertaken over a sufficient length of time and embraces all the varied circumstances likely to arise in a football season, so that the system is put to a severe test. We have no evidence yet of the efficiency of the proposed computerised turnstiles. I am advised that six companies submitted tenders for identity cards but that it may be that not one of their systems is satisfactory in meeting the requirements of 20,000 football supporters passing through the turnstiles in the evening to watch an important Cup-tie kick-off.

If tests are to be made at grounds such as those of Liverpool, Spurs or Arsenal they must be undertaken in typical circumstances. It is nonsensical and irresponsible on a great scale to proceed with the motion and to impose fees before those experiments have been completed and in advance of the authorities being established.

Since the Committee stage, a number of horrendous events have occurred that affect part II of the Bill. The withdrawal of membership cards from anyone found guilty of participating in any of those events is governed by part I. I refer to the disgraceful scenes in Sweden and to the incidents that occurred on the ship taking British supporters to a match there.

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The motion is narrow in its scope, and it cannot be in order for the right hon. Gentleman to rattle through a speech covering much wider matters while attempting to keep himself in order by occasionally using the word "fees" and "licensing authority".

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) has himself strayed from the straight and narrow from time to time. The right hon. Gentleman is a distinguished parliamentarian who knows full well the scope of the motion, and I am sure that he will take the point that has been made both by the hon. Member for Bury, North and by myself.

Mr. Howell: I assure you, Madam Deputy Speaker, that I am making every endeavour to keep within the rules of order. However, I acknowledge, as you obviously do, Madam Deputy Speaker, the political rigidity of the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt).

Whatever view is taken of the Bill by right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House, it is a matter of serious concern to all that our country's good name was disgraced on the voyage to Sweden to which I referred, in Sweden itself, and in Poland. I have a long list of other incidents that occurred during the summer that beg investigation, but I shall not bore the House with the details at this time. Even if the people responsible for those incidents can be prosecuted and convicted, the names of only five persons will be registered on the computer and prevented from travelling abroad again. After all the trouble in Sweden, Poland and even Iceland, and despite the cost to the Consolidated Fund and to the clubs, only five people may be prevented from travelling abroad in future—yet we all know that hundreds of neo-Fascists disgraced our country's good name. That should be cleared up before the Bill proceeds any further.

Mr. John Carlisle: The right hon. Gentleman appears to be misleading the House again. A few moments ago, he said that the Bill should be delayed and that fees should not be levied or paid because the system is not yet ready to be introduced. He went on to deal with part II of the Bill, which he and his right hon. and hon. Friends consistently supported in Committee and which he acknowledges has some merit and should be implemented. The right hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. Does he want the Bill to proceed as it stands or not? He knows full well that it would be impossible to implement part II of the Bill and not part I.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I advise the right hon. Gentleman not to continue down the path that he has chosen. The House is debating not the Bill but a narrow motion concerning money matters in the form of the fees that are to be paid. The right hon. Gentleman must limit his comments to that aspect.

Mr. Howell: You will be glad to learn, Madam Deputy Speaker, that my sea voyage to Sweden has ended.

The offences covered by part II inevitably affect the operation of part I, and the question of who pays for the system and the licensing fees are inter-related. Of course we support part II, but as we said throughout the Committee stage, and as was proved in the summer, the proposed scheme is wholly inadequate for its purpose. I repeat that we support it only because it is better than nothing. We are as anxious as the Government to eliminate disgraceful behaviour by British football supporters overseas.

I turn specifically to financial matters. I remarked earlier that six or seven companies have been shortlisted to operate the identity scheme, but I understand that the costs of the initial research will be £250,000. The Minister laughs because the Government are obviously not worried by such sums. The cost to fourth division clubs struggling to exist will be £10,000. In addition, £2·5 million is to be spent on testing the pilot scheme. Today, before even the football or licensing authorities have been established, the Government are imposing £2·75 million in fees in respect of a scheme that may never be implemented and which we believe to be totally inadequate and incapable of dealing with the problems that beset our great sport.

If the Government had any sense they would not have tabled the motion but would have sought to take the whole House with them. They should have allowed a breathing space to await Lord Justice Taylor's report and to allow time for the authorities to be established, so that they could initiate experiments covering every possible set of circumstances likely to arise during a season. For the Government to proceed contrary to those considerations is an act of gross irresponsibility.

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): I could not disagree more with the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell). I welcome the motion itself because, apart from anything else, it is nice to consider a motion that will bring money into the Exchequer rather than cause the Exchequer constantly to dispense it, as is the case with most money resolutions.

As you, Madam Deputy Speaker, reminded the House, the motion is narrow in its scope and relates specifically, as the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) rightly said, to clause 10(2). It concerns the ability of the Exchequer to receive fees from clubs towards the cost of establishing schemes. I sat on the Committee during the latter days before the summer recess and listened to right hon. and hon. Members of all parties as they recounted an appalling catalogue of violence and fear that has for too long been concomitant with football. During the summer I observed the violence to which the right hon. Member for Small Heath has referred, not only abroad but at the start of our own season. No one at Stamford Bridge or anywhere else, especially those responsible for football management, seems to have learnt anything about the problem.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman has just mentioned the ground belonging to the club—Chelsea—of which I am an avid supporter. Would he care to tell us what he thinks is not being done at Stamford Bridge that should be being done, to justify the direction of such a colossal calumny at that wonderful club?

Mr. Norris: I shall do so within the specific context of the money resolution, as is appropriate. It is a question of the fees that will be payable for the establishment of a membership card scheme. This, in my view, encapsulates the whole debate that took place in Committee, in which I know that the hon. Gentleman would have loved to participate if he had had time.

As a Chelsea supporter, the hon. Gentleman will recognise that the overwhelming majority of those who go to Stamford Bridge do so because they want to watch the match. They do not want any hassle. They do not want their children frightened, or to be beaten up, and they do not want to go to the match alone and virtually armed. They want to take their families. It is precisely to eliminate the inner-city mobs—the small number of people who turn such games into the battleground that they have so sadly become over the years—that the Bill has been drafted.

Conservative Members are under no illusion. It is fine to talk. As ever, we have had fine words from the hon. Member for Small Heath, but, as ever—and as in Committee—we have heard no concrete proposal from the Opposition to tackle the inner-city cancer of violence which, though perpetrated by the few, affects the enjoyment of the many.

Mr. Denis Howell: Contrary to that extraordinary proposition, we have advanced the policy that the thing to do is to target the evil-doers rather than imposing ludicrous restrictions on all the innocent football supporters. Not only did we say that the matches and the wrong-doers could be indentified and targeted—we said in Committee that the Sweden-England match was the first that should be targeted, and that the Government's failure to do so had led to all the mayhem.

Mr. Norris: There was a good deal of anecdotal reportage during what must have been one of the most entertaining Standing Committees on which many of us have ever served, and there is no doubt that those of us who emerged from it—bloody but unbowed—know much more about Sheffield Wednesday in the 1930s, not to mention Accrington Stanley and many other fine clubs and traditions. We heard a brilliant exposition of the importance of identifying the clubs involved——

Mr. Burt: And Millwall Tommy.

Mr. Norris: I am very sorry, Madam Deputy Speaker, that you did not have the opportunity to learn about Millwall Tommy. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes)—who is in the Chamber, as I expected him to be—brought a lump to my throat when he expounded on the merits or, indeed, demerits of Millwall Tommy. It was a wonderful experience.

Although we have had a homily about the importance of ridding the game of the few offenders—and who in his right mind could disagree with that proposition?—we have been all too short of a mechanism to achieve it. My hon. Friend the Minister, however, is seeking to provide finance for a workable scheme. He wants to be sure that it works before he introduces it, enabling us to identify those who commit offences at matches and should therefore not be allowed to attend them in future.

The right hon. Member for Small Heath has just drawn attention to the fact that once the cameras are switched on, the hand motions will have to go. I take the point. From now on I shall keep my hands in my pockets. I cannot see any of us getting on unless we do so.

The significant difference between the Opposition and Conservative Members who supported my hon. Friend the Minister in Committee is that the former have been keen to listen to those whom I can only describe as the ill-informed, who have spoken to them, perhaps, on the terraces at Hillsborough and elsewhere. They have flooded us with the cards that were thrust under their noses, requiring little more than a signature, purporting to express views about a matter that they clearly had not studied. Conservative Members, however, have produced concrete proposals to deal with this major problem.

Sadly, we shall not catch all those who perpetrate the violence. There will, I fear, still be violence on our terraces, even when the scheme is in operation. There is however, a stark contrast between the experience of the average club in the Football League with that of the club formerly presided over by my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans), who entertained us so much in Committee.

On the one hand—whatever the semantics and the fine arguments about the effects on turnover, profit or attendance—we have a ground that is, quite simply, free of violence. That has never been denied. On the other, the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)—being an assiduous attender at Stamford Bridge—has had the opportunity to observe the inadequacy of the preparations made by other clubs in the league. Their chairmen have now squealed about the tremendous burden and cost to the clubs. The reason why today's resolution is so important is that they have failed to observe their common duty to provide security and facilities which even begin to compare with the ludicrous fees that they have been prepared to pay to players.

If the Bill and the money resolution help to put the balance right and to make football once again a game to which whole families can go without fear and trepidation, it will constitute a major advance against one of the real social evils of our day. On that basis, I commend the resolution unreservedly.

10.27 am

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): One of our problems when a Bill is guillotined is that Conservative Members immediately waste the Committee's time, and many issues that we wish to discuss at length are not discussed for that reason. A perfect example is the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris), who has admitted that he has only ever seen one football match—and that was when the chairman of Luton Town, the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans), gave him a free ticket to Wembley for the cup final.

Mr. Norris: Rubbish.

Mr. Ashton: The hon. Gentleman made great play of our proposals. Perhaps he does not know that the Football Grounds Improvements Trust gives £9 million a year to grounds, much of it to prevent violence through the use of cameras, videos and better policing and technology. The trust was set up following a proposal that I made in the House back in 1974 that a football betting levy scheme be set up to take money from the pools. The pools then voluntarily set up their own trust to provide grounds money out of their profits. My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) has followed the same line.

We have indeed made concrete proposals, and 99 per cent. of the problems inside the grounds have been solved through the use of better policing and technology. I do not want to widen the debate; I merely wish to answer some of the nonsense poured out by the hon. Member for Epping Forest. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] He has disappeared, as usual. The hon. Gentleman invariably comes out with long perorations—despite knowing nothing about either the Bill or the game—and then immediately disappears from the scene.

Let me return to this narrow motion, which we all expected the Minister to introduce because of the guillotine. As I recall, we were promised an extra day, not after the Bill had been passed, as the Minister said this morning, but before. The Bill was rushed into the House within two or three weeks of the tragic events at Hillsborough. On 15 April, when delaying people at the turnstiles meant that, ultimately, the gates had to be opened and 95 people poured in to their deaths, we thought it was proved that we should have time to give the Bill measured consideration.

As has been said, it was stupidity and madness to introduce the Bill before the Taylor report was finalised and without listening to its recommendations, which we should have studied in a calm and measured way, to assess how the system should be amended so that we can prevent such a disaster happening in the future.

The Minister promised, as I recall, that although a guillotine motion was to be imposed, there would be further full-day debates before the Bill passed into law. We have not had them. The House has been misled. The Minister said in an intervention this morning that there would be a full-day debate on the licensing authority, but by then it will be no good because the Bill will be law.

I am not saying that the Taylor report was held back, as it was done very quickly after the Hillsborough disaster, but it is amazing that it was released the Friday after the House had gone into recess, when many hon. Members had gone on holiday. The media were concerned that there should be some analysis and discussion of the Taylor report, but it has never been discussed in the House. This is our first chance to do so.

Ninety-five people went to their deaths that day, and all sorts of allegations have been made about the police. There have been stories in the press, and some of the police are now being prosecuted. The chief constable offered his resignation, which was not accepted. The disaster was one of the biggest news stories of the year and £10 million has been raised for the dependants of people who died. Councils in Nottingham, Liverpool and Sheffield have been involved. It was one of the biggest events of the year, but it has had little discussion in the House—all we have today is this motion.

Mr. Burt: It is not fair to suggest that the Minister has misled the House. The hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) is aware that this is an enabling Bill and that, after it becomes an Act, there will be a period of delay before its measures are implemented. If the hon. Member checks his memory he will realise that the Minister promised that, during that period, there would be a debate on the Taylor report. That has always been contemplated. There has been no change. There is no question of the Minister misleading the House in the way that the hon. Gentleman has suggested.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I shall be obliged if the hon. Gentleman who now has the Floor does not respond to those comments. We must confine ourselves to discussion of the motion.

Mr. Ashton: Clause 10 provides that the licensing authority may grant a licence

"in such form . . . as may be determined by the Secretary of State."

Everything depends on the whim, fancy and decision of the Secretary of State. The Bill gives enormous powers to the Secretary of State. Once the Bill has been passed, it will be too late to do anything about it.

The motion refers to cash being granted to a licensing authority that has not yet been set up. Will the licensing authority have the power to overrule the police, or are the police still in absolute control, as they were at the time of the Hillsborough disaster? Will the licensing authority or the Secretary of State have the power to tell the police that they do not agree with what they are planning to do? For example, could they have said that the Liverpool supporters should not have been in the small end of the ground and the Nottingham Forest supporters in the large end, as that was one of the reasons for the disaster? Will the authority have the power to overrule the police? It does not say.

Clause 10 says that the conditions surrounding the cash that the licensing authority will have to pay into the Consolidated Fund

"may include conditions imposing requirements as respects the seating of spectators."

They "may include". Who will decide? If there is a row between the club and the licensing authority, will it be the Secretary of State or the police who make a decision?

I am sorry to have to refer to Hillsborough again, but it is relevant. Since the disaster, the terracing at the Leppings lane end of the ground has been closed off to spectators, who are not allowed access through the gate at that end. That has caused inconvenience to people in the club. I know about that, because I am a shareholder in Sheffield Wednesday, although there is no financial reward for that.

The club has received complaints from people who attend regularly that they have to walk all the way around the ground and that matches have had to be played with that end closed off. The police have not allowed the barriers to be re-erected and they have even said that a match that was due to be played between Liverpool and Sheffield Wednesday on the anniversary of the disaster —by some quirk of the computer—should be brought forward to a Wednesday night in early December. That will cause enormous inconvenience to the Liverpool supporters, who will have to travel over the Pennines in the pitch dark, probably in snow and frost. The match that was scheduled for new year's day has got to kick off at 12 o'clock, which will mean Manchester City supporters having to set off in the dark, in the frost and snow.

The police are continually laying down this hard and fast line. Throughout Britain, spectators tell us that the police reaction has been one of overkill, and has reduced the numbers in football grounds. Spectators had to produce tickets more than 100 yards from the ground at the Arsenal and Liverpool match the other night. Kick-offs have been delayed by 20 minutes, and there is utter confusion on television, the radio and in newspapers about kick-off times. Who is in charge? What is the point of having a licensing authority if the police will still have overall control, and can say that it does not matter what people do, or how many people in the licensing authority represent supporters or clubs, they will decide?

These examples show that the Bill is in complete confusion. When a Bill is guillotined through the House after a disaster has taken place, it is a panic political response to show that something must be seen to be done, and that it does not matter whether it is the right or the wrong thing.

During the debate on Monday, as can be seen from the amendments, there will be three to four hours for discussion before Third Reading, and the Divisions will take up all that time.

A thousand serious questions have been raised this morning and during Committee but they have not been answered, except in a clownish way by the hon. Member for Epping Forrest, who added nothing to the debate, or by the cheap points that were made about Luton Town football club being a great success. These are serious issues about violence and law and order. People are being crushed to death inside football grounds, but the issue has not been analysed and no answers have been given to the House, which has had no chance to debate the subject at the length it deserves.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): This motion may seem to be a small detail of the Football Specators Bill. I am sure that that is how the Minister and his supporters see it, but it ought not to be recorded at all —it ought not to be rumbling on as it is. It is another element in pushing through a Bill which ought to await measured discussion on every detail of the Taylor report. It is no use right hon. and hon. Members saying that there will be another debate on whether to bring it into effect. By that stage, everything in this motion and all the details of the Bill will be in print, on the statute book, and incapable of amendment. To change it, we shall have to go through the whole process again, and I am sure that the Government have no intention of bringing in another Bill. It will be a case of take it or leave it with the Football Spectators Bill and this motion, as passed.

That is no way to respond to a serious, high-level inquiry into a monumental disaster which revealed some of the terrible dangers in this measure. The Bill is a lunatic response to serious problems and I am amazed at the capacity of Conservative Members to talk themselves into the belief that the Bill will do some good, when they are just devising some sort of political response to a situation for which they have no answers.

The motion talks about the fees that will have to be paid by the very clubs which will have their gates decimated by the Bill. The fees will be levied on clubs which will lose casual specators. Throughout Britain, people watch football matches on a Saturday but they have no regular commitment to a particular club. It does not seem likely that they will get involved in membership schemes, but they constitute a significant minority in the attendance at football matches. If those people are taken away, how will the clubs pay those fees, and how will they pay for the cost of improvements to grounds and of additional security? Those are the sort of things for which we should be finding ways and means and, as has been pointed out, the Football Trust is involved in that. That is where the money should be spent, not on financing a licensing authority to carry out this ludicrous scheme.

The third and fourth division clubs which are not paying ridiculous fees for players, do not have fancy sums of money to play around with and those whose gates are the smallest will find the scheme a heavy burden. I see the problem clearly from the standpoint of Berwick Rangers which is in the happy position of being the one League club in England which will not be subject to the scheme. If that club had been included, this could have been regarded as a hybrid Bill and these shambolic proceedings could have been brought to a halt at a much earlier stage. Many third and fourth division clubs are in a position similar to a team such as Berwick Rangers and have to manage on relatively small gates. We hope that the number of people attending will increase, but the gates will not provide the income necessary to carry out the improvements about which we have been talking. Clubs of that type where there is no violence, and no great press of people giving rise even to incidental violence or hooliganism, will have to bear the burden of the scheme, as will innocent spectators.

We do not know whether the scheme will go ahead at all. Yet the licensing fees and the provision for them is being brought before us today. We do not know much about the licensing authority, but if it is like any other body to which Ministers in the Department of the Environment appoint members, such as the National Rivers Authority and its regional advisory committees, it will consist of paid-up supporters of the Government. If we are lucky, people who know about football will pick up one or two places. The way in which Ministers exercise their powers of patronage should be a lesson as to the sort of body to be created. Ministers will say that we must have people on the authority who are committed to the success of the scheme, but they will have to go a long way to find people who know about football and believe in the scheme as there are only a handful of them and they are mainly Conservative Members.

Mr. Norris: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that among those who can be counted as the most ardent supporters of a scheme to control membership, which is what we are discussing here, are the police. In stark contrast with some directors of clubs, the police have made it clear from the outset and throughout the Committee proceedings that they believe it necessary to introduce a scheme to control membership and that they welcome participation in it. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) will confirm that Mr. Alan Dyer, chief constable of Bedfordshire, has commented favourably on the scheme which operates at Luton Town football club, and that colleagues of his in the Association of Chief Police Officers have expressed similar optimistic comments about the scheme.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman should talk to the Police Federation which represents the ordinary constables who will have to face the crowds outside the turnstiles when the scheme is introduced. The arrangements at Luton Town must be satisfactory to the police and are not likely to give rise to problems, but anyone who thinks that one can run football on the basis that people cannot watch it will have to think again.

Mr. Moynihan: The Police Federation suggested a scheme far more draconian than that before the House today and sought to extend the Luton scheme nation wide with a ban on away supporters.

Mr. Beith: As I was saying, I do not believe that one can run football in this country as a spectator sport without away supporters.

Mr. David Evans (Welwyn Hatfield): I must explain to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) that only 45,000 people go to away matches per week. We are therefore talking about 10 per cent. of those going to football matches, so the hon. Gentleman's ridiculous statement about people not going to football matches is completely irrelevant to the argument.

Mr. Beith: Those 45,000 people have a right to enjoy their Saturdays. The vast majority of them are not hooligans but people who want to watch football. I do not understand the hon. Gentleman's figure. Thousands of football supporters cannot be classified as either home or away supporters and their liberty would be involved if any scheme of this kind were to be pursued.

We are in danger of going far wider than the motion before use. It is extraordinary that in the face of experience this year, the Government should go against all the advice that they have received and carry on with the Bill so that it will be cut and dried in every detail before we have an opportunity to consider the Taylor report. This is another example of the Prime Minister calling the tune—as she does in economic policy—and another example of a Minister who could usefully resign.

10.45 pm

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): I want to correct the impression given by the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) that the information given and the experiences shared in Committee were not relevant to our discussions. I am a relatively new Member of the House and I was delighted to participate in a Committee with my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell), and my hon. Friends the Members for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) and for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry). They brought a great deal of experience to the Committee. As the House and Committee members will know, I am the president of two small football clubs in my constituency which will not be affected directly by the membership scheme.

I oppose the ways and means motion because it will ensure that clubs such as Leicester City in my constituency will not be able to afford the improvements that are necessary if the game is to survive. The Government should be providing more resources to enable clubs to invest in football rather than fining clubs, which is what the motion will do.

I and other hon. Members fear that the Bill is a forerunner to the possibility of compulsory identity cards being imposed on all citizens. The evidence submitted to the Minister of State, Home Office by independent organisations made it clear that motions of this kind and the imposition of fees will not pay for the scheme. They have said so in respect of the possibility of compulsory identity cards for all citizens and of the imposition of cards for football supporters.

I share the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Small Heath and my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) as I believe that the motion should not proceed until the House has had a chance to discuss the recommendations of the Taylor inquiry. I was surprised that the interim report of the inquiry was published as soon as Parliament had risen for the long summer recess. The House should have debated the interim report before coming to this motion. Lord Justice Taylor is one of the country's most eminent judges and the Secretary of State gave him a wide criteria of references. It is possible that Lord Justice Taylor will come forward with recommendations concerning fees. I understand that he has a copy of the Bill and of the Committee's deliberations and he may want to comment on the imposition of fees proposed by the ways and means motion. I urge the Minister to accept that the proper procedure is to await the final report of Lord Justice Taylor to see what he has to say about this important matter and about clause 10. Obviously, if he makes no recommendations it will be safe to proceed.

During the summer recess, I visited the Norman Chester centre in my constituency, which has been referred to by many right hon. and hon. Members. I do not know whether the Minister has visited the centre, but I hope that he will listen to its views about the Bill, particularly about clause 10. Its views would be of much interest to him. The centre opposes the Bill because it does not believe that it will solve the underlying problems that the Government wish to solve.

During my visit, I heard the news that the Department of the Environment had voted the Norman Chester centre a grant of £40,000. I support that Government expenditure, because I believe that it is the only centre of its kind in the western world. It makes a valuable contribution and has assisted hon. Members with briefings and information. The grant of £40,000 has been given to the centre to monitor the effects of the Bill. It is strange that the Government have not worked out their own conclusions about the possible effects of the Bill but have to vote money to outside organisations to monitor what happens. The safest course of action would be to give the grant to the centre, enabling it to monitor an experimental scheme along the lines suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Small Heath and see whether the experiment works. If the proposed changes are successful, Labour Members will be the first to support what the Government are doing, but it is dangerous to go ahead with the resolution and the Bill without considering those effects, and then to ask an independent organisation to monitor the effects because the Government do not know what will happen.

I hope that the Minister will visit Leicester and meet the Norman Chester centre's director, John Williams, and others, and I hope that he will press the vice-chancellor of the university to provide more facilities and a building from which the centre can conduct its important research. Most of all, I hope that the Government will think again about the resolution, realise that procedurally it is not the correct way to proceed, and return at a later stage if the report recommends the identity scheme and we shall support the resolution at that time.

10.52 am

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Once again, the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) and his right hon. and hon. Friends have followed the chorus of disapproval for the Bill and the resolution. He showed what members of the Committee experienced before and throughout the passage of the Bill—the utter complacency of Opposition Members and, in some cases, of the hierarchy of football management on the Football League and Football Association. They say all is well and that nothing should be done.

In Committee, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) and other Opposition Members said that there is nothing seriously wrong with football and that the hooligan problem will go away. After the Stockholm trouble, the right hon. Member for Small Heath was quoted as saying, "We need more arrests." That was his answer to the problem. He did not suggest how those arrests would be made or how the troublemakers and hooligans would be identified. Throughout the Committee proceedings, Opposition Members displayed an abdication of responsibility and utter complacency. They did not accept that we face a serious problem and that only the Government have the guts to face it.

Mr. Denis Howell: The hon. Gentleman knows that that is a monstrously inaccurate, almost libellous, statement. In Committee, we said that what has been done inside grounds—I am giving credit to the Prime Minister and her colleagues—has led to considerable improvements. The trouble is the social problem outside grounds, inside shopping centres and motorway service stations and on trains. We said that the people who caused trouble in Sweden, and the people who cause trouble in this country, should be apprehended because they are common criminals dealing with evil. They should be dealt with in the normal way.

Mr. Carlisle: I shall not follow that comment because I know that I should be going against the instructions that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, gave the House.

The right hon. Gentleman's intervention re-emphasises that the Opposition are interested only in delaying tactics. The reason why they may oppose the resolution later in the Lobby is not because of a passionate belief that the system will not work but because they want to block any scheme put forward to correct the problem. That is what Conservative Members found so frustrating about their tactics and those of the Football League management. Had that management accepted some of the recommendations of the all-party football committee—the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) will remember the discussions that we had years ago—we may not have had to ask the House to pass the Ways and Means resolution.

Regrettably, since the season started, arrests, inside and outside football grounds have been running at about the same level as in the past two seasons. We had some appalling scenes in London a few weeks ago. At the Arsenal-Liverpool match the other night, many police had to be employed to protect not only those going to the ground but—and this is why the Ways and Means resolution is required—those who live around the ground who have nothing to do with football.

The extraordinarily selfish attitude of Labour members is that the problem affects only football and that it should therefore be addressed only with football in mind. The success of the Luton town scheme, which was so admirably introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans), is its benefit to the town itself. The spin-off of that scheme is that the game and the stadium have benefited. I should thank the management of Luton town and my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield, because my constituents can go about the town in peace on a Saturday afternoon, which cannot be guaranteed in most other towns and cities when a football match is taking place.

Mr. David Evans: My hon. Friend says that one can walk around Luton on a Saturday afternoon free from hooligans, bullies and cowards, but is he aware that at Highbury stadium——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I must, yet again, refer hon. Members to what is on the Order Paper. This has nothing to do with the resolution.

Mr. Carlisle: I am sure that my hon. Friend should not wish to stray away from this important subject. The basis for the fees that we are considering is important for people outside football—a problem that has been completely ignored by Labour Members.

Relevant to the fees that we are discussing and to some news that appeared this morning is the opinion that has been expressed by the Football Supporters Association, which received constant support throughout the Committee's proceedings from Labour members and which has since taken on a rather important role in the argument. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Minister has acknowledged that it has an important role to play. In this morning's edition of The Daily Telegraph, Mr. Rogan Taylor discusses England's prospects in the World cup. It is important that the motion is passed because the World cup is to be played next summer. Mr. Taylor says:

> "We need to attract the family group, the reasonable supporter to the England trips so that the tickets in Italy go to decent supporters. We want to give them an alternative to travelling with hooligans . . . We need to isolate and alienate those who might cause trouble so that they can be easily identified and either expelled . . . or even arrested."

That is relevant to the resolution. We need to get the Bill on to the statute book to support the very sentiments expressed by Mr. Rogan Taylor, which are well-supported by the Opposition, unless they suddenly dissociate themselves from his remarks. The fees are required so that the Bill can pass through the House unimpeded. That is why Conservative Members are delighted that the Leader of the House had the good sense to ask the House to support a guillotine motion to cut short the disgraceful delaying and filibustering tactics that were used in Committee.

The country, the football authorities and the whole machinery of football needs the Bill. That is why it is imperative. The sooner we approve that the money should be made available the better, and the greater thanks we shall receive from those inside and outside football for our courage and our determination to tackle the problem.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): Once more we have had to hear the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) tell us how good the Luton Town scheme is. It is quite irrelevant to the motion and to the Bill itself, because if every club had to adopt Luton Town's financial situation, many of them would be out of business. Luton Town is in terrible trouble because of that scheme.

The hon. Member for Luton, North quoted Rogan Taylor of the Football Supporters Association. The Government should have been listening to precisely such a responsible approach to what would have been Part II of the Bill. The Minister has said many times that the football supporters should be listened to, but why does he not put it on the face of the Bill that they should be represented on the various responsible bodies? He has not done so, so we shall be arguing that the licensing authority and the membership authority should include representatives of the football supporters talking in the responsible way that has been brought to our notice by the hon. Member for Luton, North.

There are three good reasons why we should not be debating the motion this morning. First, we are debating it before Report and Third Reading. It is clear from the Order Paper, that the Government propose to change the character of the Football Licensing Authority. We should not be debating the motion in a vacuum. We should be debating the Government's intentions concerning the powers of the FLA and the money aspect. That is one good reason why we should be debating the money aspect on or after Report and Third Reading.

Secondly, my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) pointed out that we have not had an opportunity to debate Taylor's interim report. Because of the timing of that report—we do not blame Lord Justice Taylor, who had to rush through an interim report—we should have been able to debate it as soon as we returned after the recess, and before considering the money resolution. The interim report contains many issues that should be debated and has caused a great deal of confusion in the 92 football clubs.

Thirdly, clause 10 was never really debated in Committee because of the Government's bulldozing tactics. Because they wanted to guillotine our deliberations, we did not have the opportunity to discuss clause 10.

Another good reason that has emerged from today's debate is that, as the Minister said, the Secretary of State can override the recommendations of the football authorities on new technology. We know that six computer companies have been shortlisted. The Minister should listen as I am raising a vital matter. We know how the new Whip, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) behaved in Committee, and he is continuing that behaviour on the Treasury Bench.

If the committee set up by the FA and the Football League to scrutinise in great depth the new technology of the ID-card scheme reaches the conclusion that none of the six companies is capable of introducing a workable scheme, will the Secretary of State overrule the committee's decision? The Minister owes it to the House to say whether the Government will override a committee that has studied the matter in great depth.

The football world welcomes the standardisation of safety rules throughout the country, but the licensing authority would have to consult closely the football authorities and the Football League.

The interim report has created a good deal of confusion and difficulty in the 92 league clubs. Lord Justice Taylor states:

"where there are perimeter fences all gates to the pitch should be kept fully open during the period when spectators are on the terraces."

But there are different interpretations across the 92 league clubs. For example, Tottenham has taken all its fences down, another club has the bolts slid out with the gates in place, others remove the gates entirely. We should have debated the Taylor report because the Minister has to address such issues.

Will the Minister spell out whether the licences, once granted, will stay in force for a specified period, as that is not clear from the Bill? In answer to a question tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) the Minister said, on 20 June this year, that the FLA would cost some £500,000 to £750,000 —presumably over a season. In view of some of the statements that have been made, has that figure changed? How will the cost be shared among the league clubs? We have heard that the average cost to each club could be up to £10,000. We know that some of the smaller clubs could not possibly afford that amount of money. Tranmere, Darlington, Bury, Chester, Stockport and Bristol are all represented by marginal Conservative seats, so we know that hon. Members representing those constituencies will be very worried about their clubs going out of existence because of the Bill.

Since Hillsborough, the FLA has acquired a new dimension and has become a much more important body. It has sweeping powers: it can force clubs to close parts of their grounds, and it can keep football supporters away. There is very little opportunity for the average football supporter to have any say in all this. Appeals can be made within 21 days, but to whom should they appeal? We certainly know that the composition of the FLA would not include a football supporter. I hope that the Minister will say whether football supporters will be represented.

We also know that the terms and conditions imposed by the FLA are not subject to appeal, unlike the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975 introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Small Heath.

I have tried to keep strictly in order and you, Madam Deputy Speaker, have been very tolerant. It is absolutely clear that the Government have not timed the resolution very well. We should have discussed it within the whole spectrum of the interim report. Better still, we should have waited until the final report. Since we have such an inquiry into the safety aspect of football, it makes no sense to mess around with interim measures that will not help that great game progress.

I should like the Minister to answer my specific points and some of the valid points which have been made by my right hon. and hon. Friends. The Minister knows that the legislation will threaten this great game. I hope that the new Secretary of State will not be like his predecessor, but will view this matter much more clinically and objectively. I hope, therefore, that we will soon see the demise of this legislation.

11.10 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): Many points have been raised and, as you rightly pointed out, Madam Deputy Speaker, many were out of order within the context of this narrow motion. Of course, important questions arise. Without exception, they are covered by a variety of amendments which we will discuss in a detailed and lengthy debate on Monday.

As is customary, the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) addressed the motion precisely. I would pick him up only on an inaccuracy. He felt that the motion had been tabled too recently and thus the Opposition had not been given enough time to consider it. I accept that the end of July is one of our busiest times, when the effects of motions are not always observed by every hon. Member, but this motion was first put on the Order Paper on 28 July. I hope that that gave hon. Members the opportunity to consider it in detail.

The ways and means motion is required to enable any fees received by the Secretary of State in respect of the issue of licences by the Football Licensing Authority to be paid into the Consolidated Fund. The Football Spectators Bill establishes the Football Licensing Authority. Football clubs will need a licence from the FLA before they can admit spectators to a match designated under the Bill. In addition to its task of ensuring that clubs operate the national membership scheme effectively, Government amendments in Committee have given the FLA the task of advising the Secretary of State on seating accommodation at football grounds and, subject to parliamentary approval in the light of Lord Justice Taylor's final report, additional powers in respect of safety at football grounds.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Will the hon. Gentleman give way? [AN HON. MEMBER: "No."]

Mr. Moynihan: Let me proceed for a short time on this point.

Mr. Heffer: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. When I asked the Minister to give way, the Whip said no. Who decides whether the Minister gives way?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): All I heard was the Minister's statement that he would give way in a moment.

Mr. Moynihan: I said that I would give way to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer). He is aware that it is best to develop the argument, let it rest and then allow him to intervene. Funding of the FLA was discussed in Committee. I explained then that we had three options: we could recover the full cost from licence fees; we could meet the cost from the Exchequer; or we could arrive at a balance between the two. Having considered this further, we decided that it would be appropriate to meet the FLA costs by a mix of licence fees and grant aid. I give way to the hon. Member for Walton.

Mr. Heffer: I was going to ask the hon. Gentleman why we are pressing forward with the measure at this stage. This question has been raised by my hon. Friends and we need an answer. Why has the motion been tabled at this stage, without our having discussed Lord Justice Taylor's interim report? [Interruption.] I know that the question has been raised a hundred times. I will raise it again. I want to know the reason. These matters are of the utmost importance, especially to areas such as mine, which suffered great loss of life because of what happened at Hillsborough.

Mr. Moynihan: It is the determined wish of Government to ensure that there is a framework of legislation in place as soon as possible so that any recommendations in Lord Justice Taylor's final report that relate to the safety of spectators at football matches can be implemented as soon as possible. If we did not have the framework of legislation in place, we would have to wait later—possibly a delay of a year—before we might be able to implement by law the very important safety recommendations that Lord Justice Taylor may make in his final report.

Mr. Tony Banks: The question is simple: what happens if Lord Justice Taylor says that there should not be a membership scheme?

Mr. Moynihan: I have made the point absolutely clear to the House many times. The whole House will have the opportunity to consider everything that Lord Justice Taylor says. It will be able to consider all the arguments that he puts forward to support his conclusions. It is right for Parliament then and there to consider those arguments in the light of the various views put forward by Lord Justice Taylor. To hypothesise about what may or may not be in the report is not only redundant in terms of the time of the House but totally irrelevant to the motion before us.

Mr. Beith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Moynihan: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene on that point, I will not give way, because it is clearly out of order and beyond the remit of the motion. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene on the motion, I shall be happy to give way.

Mr. Beith: What will happen if Lord Taylor's report gives rise to a feeling that either the terms of the motion or other parts of the Bill need to be altered?

Mr. Moynihan: If the hon. Gentleman had studied the Bill carefully, he would know that we have a framework that does not need to be altered. Any safety recommendation can be accommodated within the Bill's scope. It is a framework to cover a national membership scheme and extensive licensing powers concerning safety, which I very much hope the hon. Gentleman will welcome.

We estimate that the FLA's annual budget will be between £500,000 and £750,000, as the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) pointed out. As a non-departmental public body, this will be met from my Department's vote. It is difficult to be more precise about the costs until the safety functions of the FLA have been finalised. A proportion of these costs will be recovered through licence fees, but we do not have in mind any rigid percentage. As the hon. Members for Stalybridge and Hyde and for Bradford, South pointed out, it is important to be flexible in our approach to the amount paid by different clubs and to be cognisant of their ability to pay. We seek to recover about £250,000 from football, which will mean about £2,500 per club.

I speak generally because we need to look at the recommendations on safety which Lord Justice Taylor may make, which will affect the FLA's work. It is important that we continue our discussions on how the amount is to be raised from football, whether by a flat-rate charge or, more likely, a sliding scale, charging big clubs higher amounts and smaller clubs lesser fees. That has been the view of football authorities in initial discussions with us. I have considerable sympathy for their argument for a sliding scale of fees, but we must discuss the matter further.

On Report on Monday, I shall table a new clause to the Bill which will provide for any licence fees received by the FLA to be surrendered by the authority to the Secretary of State. In accordance with standard Government accounting procedures, the fees will be treated as revenue and the Secretary of State will, in turn, surrender them to the Consolidated Fund. To achieve this, we are debating the ways and means motion this morning. It is by means of that motion that payments of receipts into the Consolidated Fund are authorised.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Watford) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

The House proceeded to a Division—

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East) (seated and covered): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The closure has just been moved. Some of us have been in the Chamber since 9.35 am. I have been here the whole time, except for three minutes when I went out to get information that was appropriate to the debate. We have had no opportunity to contribute to the debate. I deliberately did not intervene, in order to facilitate procedures. The closure motion should not have been moved at this stage. It is part of the general procedural incompetence, mess and fiddling in which the Government have been involved on this whole measure, including the ways and means motion, which we have debated at this stage instead of after Third Reading.

Madam Deputy Speaker: A number of hon. Members have wanted to speak on the motion. The motion is very narrow in terms of debate. I believe that it has been widely debated this morning, with ample time given to it.

Mr. Tony Banks (seated and covered): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. It was quite clear that the Government Whips were actually moving for a Closure. At one point, the Minister was given his instructions by the Whip, who told him not to give way to an hon. Member who was trying to intervene. Fortunately, the hon. Gentleman did give way, which shows that he has a little residual good sense.

I am one of those hon. Members who have been in the Chamber since 9.30 this morning. Only two hon. Members were still rising in the hope of catching your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. May I ask you, with great respect, why you accepted a closure motion? What criterion did you adopt? As only two hon. Members, who had been in the Chamber throughout the debate, were still waiting to speak, should they not have been allowed to make short contributions within order?

Madam Deputy Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Chair does not have to give reasons. However, in answer to an earlier point of order, I did say that this was a narrow motion, which I felt had been thoroughly debated.

The House having divided: Ayes 133, Noes 5.

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Football Spectators Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise the payment into the Consolidated Fund of any fees received by the Secretary of State under the Act.—[Mr. Lilley.]

Orders of the Day

Children Bill [Lords]

[ALLOTTED DAY]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

New clause 10

GRANDPARENTS

'.—(1) Grandparents shall have the right of access to their grandchild before he is taken into care.

(2) Grandparents shall have the right to be present or legally represented at any hearing or inquiry concerned with access to care, fostering and adoption of their grandchild or grandchildren.'.—[Mr. Ray Powell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

11.30 am

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I beg to move that the clause be read a Second time.

I am glad to have the opportunity of supporting new clause 10 this morning. I am sure that all hon. Members will appreciate the necessity for this change in the law and will embrace the new clause. First, I pay tribute to the work of the Lords and Ladies in the other place, where the Bill began, for the tremendous amount of work that they did. I pay tribute also to all hon. Members who served on the Committee, and to the Minister, for all the trouble, effort, energy and time that they have concentrated on the interests of children. Undoubtedly, that displays to the country that Parliament is not only about politics; it is about people. Parliamentarians of all parties care about children, and my speech will show the great number of hon. Members of all parties who have contributed in this Session to the campaign to grant certain rights to grandparents so that they can protect, care for and look after their grandchildren. Having said that about the Minister and the Committee, I must point out that having read in detail the letter that the Minister of State sent me earlier this week, I am not entirely satisfied that what he said is the answer.

I have been campaigning nationally and internationally for grandparents' rights for the past three years. However, we are here today primarily to consider and promote the rights of children, not of grandchildren, parents or great grandparents. As parliamentarians, we are here to protect the rights of children by law.

This morning right hon. and hon. Members will be rightly interested in yesterday's political manoeuvres, the resignations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister's economic adviser and the other positions that were then on offer. Indeed, many hon. Members left the Chamber to get back to their offices or homes so that they could be near their telephones just in case they received a call. We also discussed the Prime Minister's statement on the Commonwealth conference in some detail yesterday, and all that that entailed.

This morning we should forget all about yesterday and about what happened earlier this morning and concentrate on this important Bill. Thousands of grandparents are suffering right now because of the complexities of the present law relating to child care. We must alter that state of affairs.

Because of the thousands of letters that I have received from grandparents on this subject, I can assure the House that grandparents are disinterested in the Chancellor's resignation, the state of the pound and in the slate for the new appointments. They are daily preoccupied with the grief, suffering, frustration and mental torture in which the law has trapped them. To love, care for and nurture one's grandchild for years and then for that grandchild to be taken away is so devastating that one cannot hope to attract responses to the matters that preoccupy hon. Members. I plead yet again that we spare parliamentary time for those less fortunate than ourselves and that we pass legislation to help them.

We are all aware of one-parent families, the increasing divorce rate and of the innocent children who are forced into the middle of a situation not of their making. We are all aware of the vile, repugnant, nauseating and extensive increase in child sexual abuse. The liberal attitudes of some people tend to condone some of those offences to a certain degree. Innocent children suffer not only from that abuse but from the after-effects and the resulting break-up of the family unit. When the stability of their family life is shattered, they soon realise that everything changes and they seek help. They search for consolation, comfort, protection and real, honest sexless love.

Let hon. Members try to imagine themselves as children again and abandoned for the reasons that I have described. To whom would they turn? Who else but the senior of the family? To whom but the mothers and fathers of one or the other of their own mothers or fathers? Children would not seek out the social services or a guardian. They would not seek anyone from outside their family unit, which is why grandparents should have the legal right to be the first people contacted. Grandparents should be the first to have a legal right to care for, protect and adopt their grandchildren so that we can avoid the escalation of such young people growing into disturbed adults, without stability in their lives and with little hope—unless we change the law.

Let the thousands of grandparents who have written to me have that right. Let the law be changed to stop the heartache, sorrow, stress, emotional unheaval, trauma, grief, mental torture and frustration that the present system inflicts not only on children, whom the Bill seeks to protect, but on their loving, caring and loyal grandparents. Grandparents are crying out with undoubted passion for something that is becoming uncommon. It is rare in this avaricious and mercenary society to find people crying out to be afforded the legal right to give something. Grandparents want to give their love, time, care and devotion. Those feelings can be understood by all who are grandparents or caring, loving and unselfish parents.

We should be grateful that the majority of people still enjoy good family life, but we are here this morning to consider a Bill to help protect family life as we know it and to protect children. That is why it is essential that we support the new clause.

The new clause is essential for all children and grandparents, but it is especially essential for those grandparents who are involved in laborious legal battles about allowing them access to their grandchildren or establishing their right to care for or adopt those children. The new clause is the only way in which it can be made abundantly clear that we respect grandparents' rights, that we appreciate their profound difficulties and are determined to rectify present injustices.

On Second Reading I referred to a ten-minute Bill that I had introduced on 17 February 1988. I also referred to an early-day motion that I had tabled, which had received 333 signatures of support from right hon. and hon. Members of every political party. Those signatures represented support from more than 60 per cent. of the House. That early-day motion read:

"That this House deplores the increasing frequency of grandparents being deprived of the right of access to, care, fostering or adoption of their grandchildren; notes with alarm the attitude of some social services employees; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to introduce early legislation to give legal rights to grandparents providing immediate right of access before children are taken into care and the right to be present or legally represented at any official hearing or inquiry regarding future access to, care, fostering and adoption of their grandchild or grandchildren."

That early-day motion commanded the support of more than 60 per cent. of the House. Therefore, the majority have made a decision and it is up to the Minister to take due note of what they have signified.

I received letters from Ministers who said that they fully supported the early-day motion, but were unable, because of the protocol of the House, to sign it. If one considers the number of Ministers, shadow Ministers and others unable to sign that early-day motion who pledged their support, it is clear that about 80 per cent. of the House is in favour of what it advocates.

I have referred to that early-day motion because new clause 10 follows, word for word, what it said. We are not allowed to discuss early-day motions, but they are referred to at length in the press, which reports on how many hon. Members sign various motions. The fact that my early-day motion received such overwhelming majority support means that it is imperative for the Minister to accept the new clause. I am not interested in receiving letters from him regarding meetings that he has had with the Opposition Front Bench team. I want him to acknowledge the wish of the majority in this House and I hope that he will embrace new clause 10 in the body of the Bill. When it becomes law the grandparents of this country will be so glad to receive the help and the assistance for which they are crying out.

The campaign for grandparents' rights has continued for more than 10 years and, apart from myself, it has also been conducted by other Opposition and Conservative Members. The problem has not recently been thrown at us; it has been outstanding for more than 10 years. That problem could be solved by new clause 10 and I trust that the Minister will give us a pledge that he will embody it in the Bill.

Only yesterday Mrs. Hughes from Hertfordshire was lobbying the House on grandparents' rights. She has no access to her grandchildren, but she thought that she should because she had reared one child for 10 years. There was, however, a dispute in the family and the daughter decided that her mother should not have right of access and took the child away. Mrs. Hughes told me that she had saved £6,000 for her retirement. She is now a widow and she cannot afford the legal fees for solicitors.

She asked me for advice to see whether she could apply for legal aid because she wanted to go to the courts to try to gain access. Her problem encapsulates what new clause 10 is all about. We can all imagine what she is going through after 10 years of trying to see her granddaughter, but being refused her wish.

My office is only just up the Stairs above the No Lobby and I could fetch bundles of heartbreaking letters that I have received. Some people have written to tell me that they have lost their wives through suicide because they were denied access to their grandchildren. We cannot allow this to continue any longer.

The Minister may quote amendments to the Bill where he has included the word "grandparent" and for that I am extremely grateful. That inclusion, however, does not cover the problem of immediate access by grandparents. That is especially important in cases where the wife and husband have been killed in a car crash but the two children in the back of the car survive. One child may be in hospital in intensive care and the other child may be released. That child, however, is not released to its grandparents, but is sent, after one week of probationary care, to social sevices. Social services staff immediately take that child into care and appoint a guardian. In no time at all grandparents have not only lost their own son or daughter, but have lost their grandchild to social services.

As a result of new clause 10 grandparents in such cases would be contacted immediately either by the police, social services or any other local or national Government officer. They would be contacted first to see whether they were able to take care of their grandchildren. They should be the ones called on to look after their grandchildren.

An organisation called LOGIC—the love of grandparents in conflict—was established about 12 months ago. I am glad to say that it was created by grandparents throughout the country to advise grandparents on how to get legal advice—some of it free, some of it at substantially reduced rates. I do not want to criticise the two lawyers who serve as Ministers on the Bill, but many of my constituents who are miners made redundant in the past 10 years find themselves looking at their bank balances to see whether they can knock on the doors of barristers and solicitors who charge high fees. Although grandparents want to extend their rights to look after their grandchildren most are prevented from engaging the services of solicitors for financial reasons. As a result, they lose their rights to their grandchildren.

A letter in the Manchester Evening News in September 1989 referred to a grandparent who had criticised other grandpareats for demanding rights of access to their grandchildren or the right to adopt them. The letter says:

"I feel deeply sorry for Realistic Grandmother of Wythenshawe, who says that grandparents are interfering old men and women who should not have "rights" to their grandchildren.

I have five lovely grandsons, aged 16 down to three, and I do not know what I would have done without them, particularly since I lost my husband three years ago.

What a lot of love and happiness this embittered old grandmother is missing. Does she know what it is like to feel lonely and depressed, then suddenly the phone will ring and I hear one of my grandsons say, "Hello grandma"? It's music in my ears.

They share their news with me, be it good or bad, and I share mine with them.

She says she has not seen her grandson for 11 years and does not particularly wish to, but please, before it is too late, get to know him and get that chip off your shoulder. That is why your family leave you alone, but you don't know what you are missing . . . grandchildren are jewels in your crown."

That is typical of thousands of letters about grandparents that I have received.

When we realise the pain of separation felt by grandparents we feel a responsibility as parliamentarians to do something about it. It is no legal fault of grandparents that they should be deprived of their grandchildren.

During the recess I had the great good fortune to go to Barbados to represent the House at the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association's 35th annual conference. I went with many colleagues from both sides of the House, and there we discussed in great depth the rights of children. We were not out there for a holiday. We held an important debate on Thursday 12 October entitled:

"What can Commonwealth Parliaments do individually and collectively to promote the survival and rights of children?"

This was not the Commonwealth conference about which we heard a statement from the Prime Minister yesterday. It was a conference at which everyone agreed about what we should be doing about the survival and rights of children. All the representatives applauded the efforts being made in their countries and I took the opportunity to go to the rostrum to speak on behalf of the United Kingdom branch about what we are doing in Parliament. I underlined the fact that the Government have brought in the Children Bill, and that it was a lengthy Bill involving many changes and a great deal of protection for the people of this country.

Naturally, I mentioned grandparents and what the laws here mean to them—they deprive them of their rights of access and adoption. Commonwealth representatives at the meeting were appalled to hear that grandparents here are not recognised as the seniors of the family unit, to be consulted before any action is taken by anyone else, including the state.

A representative from the Cook islands, who was the islands' Prime Minister last year, told me later the same day that children are treated as flowers there. He said that grandparents are consulted on each and every issue to do with the family. When there is a dispute, the family unit is called in to resolve it. The Cook islands may be small but the people there obviously nurture their children well. It is time that we looked at the example of such countries and recognised that they have always regarded grandparents as the most important members of the family, to be consulted before anyone else.

The Commonwealth conference hosted an interesting and open debate to which many members contributed, and it would be wise of the Minister, before he proceeds any further with the Bill, to read extracts from the speeches and decide whether we can copy some of the Commonwealth countries that may look to us for guidance but to which perhaps we should also look for guidance. I was surprised to hear the Speaker of the Barbados Parliament tell the conference that 35 per cent. of the children born in Barbados are in one-parent families. That causes problems, but the people there still enjoy family unity and still recognise grandparents as the senior members of the family. It is essential that we recognise that same principle.

At the beginning of my speech I outlined the support that I have received. The Government should clearly understand that the law must be changed. It is time that they looked in detail at the proposals contained in the new clause. We know that we have to protect children and I recognise that we must also protect the rights of parents. However, it is sometimes necessary in the interests of children to protect also the rights of grandparents.

In the three-year struggle to have this burning problem recognised, people from all sides of the political spectrum, not only in the House and in the other place but throughout the country, have campaigned with me. First, I introduced a 10-minute Bill and then an early-day motion. That was followed by a national lobby of grandparents and following that, grandparents from all over the country held a meeting in Westminster hall. The meeting was addressed by 25 hon. Members representing all the parties in the House. I am sorry that the compassion and the pleas of those hon. Members were not recorded. It is a shame that television cameras were not present in Westminster hall for that meeting.

I look forward to television cameras coming into the Chamber. I do not know whether they will be able to take head and shoulder shots of me or whether I will have to stand on the Bench in order to be caught by the camera. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) has said that if I were to speak from the Dispatch Box I would need to stand on an orange box in order to be able to see over it. When I speak about my size I always think about Lloyd George. He had other problems although they may not have been connected with grandparents. He was very short but he was dynamic. I expect that he was a grandparent.

I continued my campaign by means of petitions, the first of which contained 12,000 signatures and asked for a change in the law. There was a further petition containing 8,000 names. I have also had Adjournment debates. Hon. Members know the ritual. Anyone who wants to promote something has to go through all the processes to get parliamentary support and approval to try to get the Government to understand that there is a problem that needs to be solved. I continually raised the issue in business questions and spoke on Second Reading of the Bill. The Government pulled up stumps at 1.30 on Wednesday morning, but if they had not I had enough material to keep the House going until the date set for the new Session. Perhaps the Government were aware of that and that was what made them introduce the guillotine.

I appreciate the work that has gone into the Children Bill and I am sure that all hon. Members appreciate the work carried out by the Committee. I pay tribute to the members of the Committee for the major concessions that they have won from the Government, such as the inspection of private schools, safeguarding runaways, registration of day care facilities, registration and inspection of private children's homes, restrictions on local authority powers to remove children from home without a court order and limited reform of the court system. Those are all excellent measures and I pay tribute to the Opposition team for ensuring that those concessions were made by the Government.

I applaud the Government for recognising that they were advancing the rights of children by paying attention to those matters. I should be pleased if the Minister would now rise in his place and say, "Yes, the hon. Member for Ogmore can have new clause 10. We will put it on the statute book." Grandparents from all parts of the country —indeed, 10 million votes—are out there waiting to support such a measure. I hope that the Minister can give his support.

I have a great deal of further material on which I wish to speak. I realise that other hon. Members may wish to speak, but I wish to draw your attention, Madam Deputy Speaker, to an important matter on which I have made notes—the rights of grandparents. Society advocates that many groups of people have rights, most of which are inherent in the law of the land. We have laws to guard against discrimination on grounds of race or creed. We have unions to fight for workers' rights. Other groups, rightly, fight for more thought to be given to the rights of the handicapped. The laws governing the rights of children and parents are constantly evolving. Nearly every section of society is covered by laws guarding its rights against injustice. However, one vulnerable and defenceless group is sadly neglected by the law and by society. Grandparents are used, abused, forgotten or simply not considered. Yet they are the bedrock and back-up system of the family. They hold a unique place in everyone's heart and mind, either through their memory if they are dead, their presence if they are alive or a sense of regret and loss if they have never been known. They are the cord holding the different branches of the family together, keeping brothers, sisters, grandchildren and cousins, in touch with each other.

Grandparents are the safety net over which family life is played out, cushioning it against the knocks of living and loving. Their children bring their problems to them. Most often, that involves the grandparent taking an active part in finding a solution. Who looks after the children while mother has to go out to work? Who steps into the breach and keeps the household running smoothly when a new addition to the family arrives? Who shops, cleans, bakes, sews, knits and gardens to help out busy parents with young children? It is the grandparents.

Until 30 years ago, grandparents lived next door or close to a daughter, son or other close relative. Sometimes a street would be inhabited by many members of one family, providing a close sense of security and protection for everyone. If the grandparents did not have their own home, they usually lived as part of the family with one of their children. Thankfully, some still do. The effect was that each generation depended upon, cared for and loved each other. Among all the roles and relationships of mother, father, daughter, son and in-law, the overriding interests are those of grandparents and grandchildren.

Thousands of books and articles have been written on parenthood and the special bond between parent and child, but equally powerful in sweetness and intensity is the relationship between grandparent and child. It has a special kind of sacredness which has to be experienced.

I wish to refer to a book on grandparents' rights. Grandparents who have legal problems, as well as those who do not, should be invited to read and digest it. It explains to them some of their rights. It explains some of the rights that perhaps the Government would be wise to spend billions of pounds advertising instead of spending that money on privatisation. Grandparents should be acquainted with their legal rights and with the book that has been produced and edited by Jill Manthorpe and Celia Atherton. I hope that grandparents will obtain copies of it. It is promoted and backed by Age Concern. If grandparents read the book and if solicitors and others are prepared occasionally to give their time to advise grandparents, without asking them for the money that they have saved throughout their life, we might be able to establish the rights that I am seeking. If the clause is agreed to, however, grandparents would be entitled automatically to take up their rights through the courts.

As I have said, I prepared enough notes to allow me to make a three-hour speech. I did so because I have read and taken note of grandparents' claims. I have visited them. I have met them in the House and I have listened generally to their tragic circumstances. It is only by taking those steps that we in the House can recognise that the law needs to be changed.

It is not right for grandparents to have to travel miles to look from behind a shelter in a school yard just to have a glimpse of their grandson or granddaughter. It is not right for us to allow the law not to extend the right of access to grandparents, the right to be able to adopt and the right to be able to care for their grandchildren before the social services or other bodies allow them to be adopted.

I have a nephew. My sister died when she was 28 years of age and my nephew was brought up in my home with three of my brothers and four of my sisters, not as a nephew but as a son. He recently celebrated his 50th birthday. When I was congratulating him on reaching half a century I told the guests at the birthday party, "My younger brother is now 50." At 50, he broke down and cried. He did so because he had never thought of himself as part of a family unit. He had always realised that he had no mother at the age of three and that we had taken him in and cared for him. It was because he was loved and cared for in a family unit that he became a responsible and proper father, and he is now a grandfather.

People outside this place who have not had the love and care of a family unit because the law does not allow grandparents to look after them are becoming adult citizens daily. In addition, there are their children, their grandchildren and future grandchildren. Unless we change the law and allow grandparents automatically to have the rights for which I am asking, we shall deprive many people. I appeal to the Minister through you, Madam Deputy Speaker, with all the passion that I can muster, to accept that there is a need for a direct change in the law. The clause should be supported unanimously to ensure that grandparents have rights. I hope that the Minister will concede and ensure that the new clause is written into the Bill. In the interests of all grandparents, I plead for a change in the law.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): If ever there were an argument for having in the House hon. Members of grandparent age, we have just heard it. None of us can have failed to be moved either by the speech of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) or by the clear evidence that that speech was the product of an enormous amount of work. All of us owe him a very great debt.

I have absolutely no doubt that, over the past 20 or 30 years, in our anxiety to provide substitute parental care for many of our children, we have allowed the pendulum to swing far too far away from the natural family as that concept has been experienced in most countries of the world throughout history. Lamentably, the proposition that grandparents should, almost as matter of course, be last in the queue to be considered as suitable people to have children placed with them has held sway in far too many of our social services departments for far too long.

I have one reservation about new clause 10(1). I had in my constituency a really horrendous case in which a father had been sexually abusing his children for a very long time with the connivance and active assistance of his parents. The proposition that grandparents should have automatic right of access to a child before it is taken into care needs to be qualified in the light of such cases.

I hope that there will emerge from this brief debate an acceptance of the clear need to reinstate the position of grandparents. It should be an essential part of any social worker's training that he or she should be expected—indeed, required—to consider whether grandparents are not the best people to look after a child who needs to be taken into care. I have heard many stories of parents—often because they have formed an oppressive and unattractive liaison which is bad for the children—falling out with the grandparents and yet having their view as to whether the children should be allowed access to their grandparents and vice versa regarded as some kind of determinant.

One of the achievements of the Children Bill has been to re-establish—perhaps even to establish for the first time—the principle that the welfare of the child is paramount. That is a powerful instrument for ensuring that parents who have taken against their own parents, are not allowed to dominate the argument about whether the grandparents should have full rights.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): My hon. Friend is on a very important point—perhaps more important than any other in this argument. I have a number of constituency cases directly affected by these matters and, tragically, the number seems to be growing. Does my hon. Friend agree that we can automatically assume that, if the grandparents are normal wholesome people—if I may put it that way without seeming to be patronising—the child can only benefit from a relationship with them? Does he agree that that should be conceded, even it the parents are being obstructive for the reasons that he so graphically described?

Mr. Rowe: I agree in principle. It is difficult to define "normal, wholesome people", because there are perfectly natural breaches between grandparents and parents on grounds of, for example, totally different religious or cultural beliefs. In those circumstances, and depending on the age of the child and how long the parents and grandparents have been estranged, and even on whether the grandparents are living in a different country, discretion must be retained.

The hon. Member for Ogmore is right to press for greater recognition by society of the importance of grandparents and of their rights vis-a-vis their grandchildren, but I have reservations about subsection (1), believing that grandparents' rights should not be automatic. However, I should like to see reversed the present situation whereby social services departments are entitled to take a decision which the grandparents, if they do not agree with it, must fight tooth and nail, against overwhelming odds. Very often, as we have heard, they lose that fight.

I argue that, through regulations or a code of conduct, or perhaps by an amendment being made to the new clause introduced in another place, social services should be required to explain to grandparents and to the court why they hold the view that the grandparents are not the right people with whom to place the child.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell). I appreciate the amount of work that my little friend has put into the problem, with a view to persuading the Government to do the right thing by children and grandparents. I have worked with my hon. Friend on that problem for a number of years. I watched carefully the faces of the Ministers on the Treasury Bench as they listened to my hon. Friend's impassioned plea. It was impassioned because my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore lives with the problem night and day, 24 hours a day. We discuss it together regularly. If one goes into his little office, one can see all the information that is stacked on his desk, on chairs and on the floor, relating to the problems of grandparents.

I welcome the day when my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore stands as a Labour Minister at the Government Dispatch Box—though I shall not be here to see it, because I am retiring at the next general election.

Mr. Ray Powell: I am most disappointed to learn that my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) will not be found in his place after the next general election. However, I hope that the message will go out to all concerned that, if he is not in this House, it only means that right hon. and hon. Members will have to walk down the corridor to see him speak in another place.

Mr. Haynes: I shall ignore my hon. Friend's remark, but I look forward to seeing on television my little hon. Friend standing at the Dispatch Box and fighting for another cause. I hope that that cause will not be grandparents but that the Minister will tell the House today, "The hon. Member for Ogmore can have his new clause 10." Nevertheless, I hope to see in the televised proceedings of Parliament my hon. Friend speaking as a Minister in a Labour Government. I shall provide the orange box on which he will probably have to stand if the television cameras at least are to be able to catch sight of him.

Let me say at the outset that I have an interest to declare. I am a grandparent. Many of the 650 Members of the House are grandparents, even Mr. Speaker himself; I have often talked to him about his grandchildren and mine, for any hon. Member can approach Mr. Speaker and have a private discussion with him.

I remember a day when Mr. Speaker beckoned me to the Chair and asked me whether, at 4 o'clock that afternoon, I would go upstairs and act as a grandparent, because he had 24 little toddlers in to tea. I said, "Of course I will." At five minutes to four he beckoned to me and pointed upstairs, and I said, "It's all right, I'm going." I went upstairs and found 24 children seated round a long table, having tea with Mr. Speaker's good lady. They were having a whale of a time. That is the kind of thing that goes on outside this place—deep in the community.

As I have said, I shall be retiring at the next election. My wife Vera and I are preparing for that day right now. We are moving to a new home, across the road from our daughter, son-in-law and two beautiful grandchidren—Anna, 10, and Edward, eight. I am down here all the week, and the only contact that I can have with those two grandchildren is by telephone—with a bit of luck. I only get to see them when I go back at the weekend.

You know, Madam Deputy Speaker, when Vera and I see those kids, we melt, because it is so beautiful. I must explain why I feel like that, because I am trying to express a view on behalf of the grandparents of this nation. They feel, justifiably, that they are getting a raw deal. It comes over loud and clear, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore has said, when we have meetings both inside and outside this place. I well remember the meeting in the Grand Committee Room to which my hon. Friend referred: it was plainly solid with grandparents, who were pleading with the 25 Members of Parliament who found the time to go and listen to their views and to those of my hon. Friend because not everyone could do so.

Before I came to this place I was a magistrate for 15 years, and I served a fair amount of that time in the juvenile court. I saw the pleas of grandparents being completely ignored, because the law was not on their side. That is why we are appealing as we are: we wanted to do it the other day and did not get the opportunity, but we are doing it this Friday morning. We followed the debate on the Football Spectators Bill—because it was very important—but we were dying for this debate to start so that we could express our views. We have been holding ourselves back: we knew what we wanted to say, and what should happen about the Bill.

There are millions of grandparents out there looking for a fair deal and hoping that the Minister will say the right thing this morning. I know that the Minister has passion within him, although he can be a hard man—as he needs to be from time to time. There is a bit of softness and feeling in the bones of that Minister.

I hope that the Minister will come to the Dispatch Box and give us what we are pleading for, as it is essential. I realise that there is a time factor here and that there are other things to discuss, but I wanted to express my view and to say where I stand on the important issue of grandparents. I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for giving me that opportunity.

12.30 pm

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I think that I am the first person to speak in this debate who is not a grandparent. I hope that I have not insulted the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) by that remark.

I have found this debate very moving, particularly the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell). I know how passionately he cares about this issue. I have had some correspondence with him about individual cases in my constituency. Many other right hon. and hon. Members have expressed their concern about this issue and would have liked to be here today. Many of them were here at 1 o'clock in the morning a few nights ago, and they were ready to speak at length on the new clause.

I will mention one of them—my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney)—who is the youngest grandparent in this place, I think. I know that he feels passionately about this issue. He is a couple of years younger than I am and, if my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore would need an orange box to stand on at the Dispatch Box, my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield would need a stepladder, as he is a good deal shorter.

I shall take up one issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore about the new clause. He knows that I have a background in social work. On many occasions I have had to take children into care. While I do not take exception to what he said about certain people who work in social services, I assure him that I know that the vast majority of practising social workers would turn first to the solid, ever-present figure of a grandparent if they have to take a child into care.

I can think of many cases when I have turned to grandparents straight away when children come into care. They have cared for the children in all sorts of circumstances. I have come across so many cases where grandparents have been the only solid, consistent figure in some children's lives, and that is why I support the new clause.

Apart from my professional interest in the subject, as a Member of Parliament I have come across many constituency cases in which the treatment of grandparents by local authorities and the courts left a great deal to be desired.

In the debate on the guillotine motion yesterday, I mentioned briefly that I had fought for a woman who is the grandparent of a six-year-old child. She brought up the child, was the only figure in the child's life and loved and cared for him in the absence of a mother. Then he was adopted, and she had no rights. She could not get legal aid, because she had no right to be heard in court. I am angry about that. The law is wrong. My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore knows of more cases, as he is very involved with this issue.

The law is wrong. I appeal to the Minister to take on board the consensus in the House on the Bill, and particularly on new clause 10, and to ensure that it is incorporated into the Bill.

The Minister for Health (Mr. David Mellor): The speech by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) reflects his great commitment to this issue, which I recognise. I join those right hon. and hon. Members who have paid tribute to him for the strength of his convictions and the eloquence with which he has put them across. Other hon. Members have rightly paid respect to his contribution and to the emotional strength of the case.

There is no doubt that, when the relationship between grandparents and children works well, there can be few better relationships. I speak as a father of young children; coincidentally—I did not arrange it because of this debate—they are spending the weekend with their grandparents, so I am well aware of the benefits of the relationship.

I do not seek to challenge the essential planks of the hon. Member for Ogmore's case, which are that the relationship between grandparents and grandchildren is vital—when it works well it has so much to offer both sides—and that the law on grandparents, as it was before the Bill, was unsatisfactory, as it did not recognise what grandparents' rights should be. I have no real quarrel with the hon. Gentleman but I will remind him of something that used to be said to me in court on the rare occasions when I was on a winning wicket but going on a little more about my case than I needed to. The judge would say, "You are pushing at an open door."

The hon. Gentleman has not recognised how far we have taken on board already, in the work done on the Bill, the points to which he attaches importance. We have made changes to the law on grandparents to which, because of his assiduity and persistence in bringing forward his private Member's Bill, he is entitled to make some claims of authorship. If the hon. Gentleman looks closely at the Bill, rather than finding cause for continued dissatisfaction he would find cause for real pride in the shared achievements.

I want to persuade the House that the impact of the Bill is marked in relation to grandparents and other close relatives. If there is any hedging or equivocation, it is only because it is necessary for us to recognise that there are some bad grandparents just as there are bad parents. The court has to take account of that possibility. However, we wish to dwell, for obvious reasons on good grandparents rather than bad.

Just as the Bill is about protecting children from bad parents, we also need to protect them from bad grandparents. We must not give grandparents rights that in some instances parents would not enjoy, just because there is, rightly, a sentimental attachment to the relationship. We have taken on board and accept the hon. Gentleman's central point that the legal rights and entitlements of grandparents must be improved, and we have improved them. I shall explain how we have done that, because many hon. Members are interested.

Mr. Ray Powell: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Mellor: I listened with great care to what the hon. Gentleman said. It may be more advantageous if I set out the heart of the matter and if the hon. Gentleman then wants me to give way I will. There comes a time at which one has to concentrate on line-by-line issues that translate our good will into effective action. I am anxious that the hon. Gentleman should not under-estimate how much has been done.

The present law is unsatisfactory. In the Children and Young Persons (Amendment) Act 1986, grandparents are made parties in care proceedings where they can demonstrate a sufficient interest in the child. However, they cannot under the Act obtain anything like the range of orders that we would like to see. For example, they cannot participate in access proceedings by asking for an access order. They cannot participate in parental rights proceedings or obtain custody on the discharge of a care order. In future care proceedings, the court of its own motion will be able to give the care of the child to a grandparent rather than to the local authority—that is, it will be able to make a residence order. That is a major step forward.

The court can also make a contact order under the Bill, even if no application has been made. That links up with the requirements laid on the court to consider specifically the contact arrangements planned by the authority and to invite the parties to the proceedings—who could include grandparents—to comment on those arrangements. In other words, in future there will be plenty of scope for grandparents who can demonstrate a reasonable connection with or interest in the child to make a case for a contact order, which is the new terminology for an access order.

Where the child is not in care, part II of the Bill very much widens the circumstances in which grandparents may apply for contact. The hon. Member for Ogmore described cases where grandparents were standing outside a playground watching a child play because that was their only contact with him. I too consider that unacceptable, if the grandparents were people that a court would want to have contact with a child. Part II of the Bill widens the circumstances in which grandparents may apply for contact.

In allowing them to do so, we recognise the close bonds of affection that ususally exist between children and their grandparents. For the first time, we have recognised in an overt way that it can be in the best interests of a child to maintain contact with grandparents, even if there is parental opposition—for example, on the break-up of a marriage. For the first time, a court will be able to deal with those issues and maintain a contact even against parental opposition. It is a great step forward. In so far as I have any troubles or concerns about the debate this morning, I feel that the hon. Member for Ogmore has not realised how far he has pushed open the door. The door has been pushed wide open due to the impact of the hon. Gentleman and others on those of us who have been working on the detail of the Bill.

At present, a grandparent's right to apply for access is arbitrary and restrictive. The Bill provides that grandparents may apply for a contact order at any time. The only proviso to screen out undesirable circumstances is that they must first get the court's permission by showing that they have a good reason. Some may ask why that is necessary. The reason is that there may be some instances where parents are justified in preventing or limiting contact between children and their grandparents. Some grandparents may attempt to interfere in the relationship between their children and grandchildren. Given that we are dealing with vulnerable children—this is, rightly, a child-centred Bill—the court should have the ability to satisfy itself that there is a good reason for doing so.

I should like to make one thing absolutely clear. I and my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General, who has had to go out for a moment but has been following the debate with great interest, are in no doubt whatsoever that in cases where grandparents have maintained a close relationship with the child, permission is unlikely to be much more than a formality. That is how we would wish it. That is a major advance, in which the hon. Gentleman can take pride.

He should take pride in that achievement, rather than feel dissatisfied. I really do not see how we could go very much further without running the risk of giving grandparents rights that we do not give to parents or other close relatives. Just as there are circumstances in which grandparents have to look after a child whose parents are tragically killed, so there are circumstances in which an elder brother or sister has had to do so. Other close family links should also be encouraged. In grouping grandparents with a range of other close relatives, one is not demeaning the position of grandparents. One would be in danger of demeaning other close relationships if one gave grandparents more rights than certain other key people.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Mellor: Perhaps in a moment.

The Bill cannot be criticised for referring to close relatives rather than singling out grandparents. Although it greatly widens the rights of grandparents, the hon. Gentleman may have missed some of its impact on those rights. My only criticism of the hon. Member for Ogmore is that he many not be aware of the good provisions in the Bill, which he provoked us into making.

Mr. Powell: When grandparents apply to put their case to a local authority hearing, the people conducting the hearing say, "You are not entitled to be legally represented." If they take the matter to court, they are told, "The court will not recognise your rights as grandparents." From the cases with which I have dealt, I understand that that is the problem with the law. New clause 10 suggests that they should be offered automatic rights of representation. I am not trying to convince the hon. and learned Gentleman that the law should be changed to give grandparents more protection than parents. I am pleading for grandparents' rights to be represented and for the court to be able to make a decision.

I am saying that the law should be clear, so that grandparents can interpret it without consulting barristers or solicitors. The law must be plain, so that people can understand it without continually having to consult the legal profession. I am pleading that new clause 10 should be accepted. The Minister's argument as to why it should not be accepted falls when we consider the requests that have been made by grandparents and the difficulties that they have experienced.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), who mentioned social care cases, will confirm what I am saying. Unless the new clause is accepted, that will continue to happen.

Mr. Mellor: I cannot help feeling——

Mr. Ray Powell: I am sorry that my intervention was so long.

Mr. Mellor: I do not mind long interventions. Happily, after a few problems on Tuesday night, we are discussing the Bill properly, with hon. Members giving their views with sincerity and vigour.

I am concerned that the hon. Member for Ogmore should not under-estimate the extent to which his case has been met by the Bill. He was primarily concerned about care proceedings, but he made some wider points, which is why I described the extent to which grandparents will benefit from the open-door policy of the Bill, which will allow them to apply for all relevant orders in most proceedings relating to their grandchildren.

Mr. Devlin: Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Mellor: No. My hon. Friend should allow me to answer the intervention, and I am halfway through doing so. The road to hell is paved with good intentions. I shall allow my hon. Friend to be helpful in a moment, but first

I shall try to be helpful. In so far as it is necessary for someone to sweep up after that, I shall allow my hon. Friend to do so.

Care proceedings are the subject of the new clause. Under the Bill, for the first time, grandparents will be able to apply to appear before the court. The court's permission will be necessary to screen out undesirables. There may be grandparents with criminal convictions whom none of us would say should be given locus standi.

The grandparents about whom the hon. Member for Ogmore is concerned will be able to apply for a residence order—what used to be called care, custody and control of a child. That will discharge any care order. Grandparents can also apply for a contact order, with the court's permission. Even if the child went into care, they could have right of access determined by the court, and therefore one could not interfere with it. That is so much better than the position under the Children and Young Persons (Amendment) Act 1986 and a sign of how far forward we have moved.

In future care proceedings, a court of its own motion will be able to give the care of a child to a grandparent rather than a local authority. The court will be able to say, "Something needs to be done about this child. It is better that he goes to the grandparents than into local authority care." That is a major step forward.

The problem with the new clause is that it has an unintended effect, in that it does not sit well with the Bill. That is why I could not accept it, even if I thought that the principles were right. It is much better that rights of access are sorted out by a court. It will be able to look at the grandparents' influence as an alternative to the care order which is being sought.

I have regarded the new clause—I hope rightly—as a way of bringing these issues sharply into focus. Sadly, it is not possible to include it in the Bill because it does not dovetail in. The new clause has given me the opportunity to say that the position on care proceedings, like any other involving grandparents' rights, has been so transformed that the hon. Member for Ogmore should be able to walk happily out of this court—I should have said House. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has never had to walk into a court. I am getting back into my bad old ways. The hon. Members for Ogmore and for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) can leave the House feeling that they have participated in a great step forward for grandparents' rights. I am sorry if I bang on about it, but I should hate it if the hon. Member for Ogmore should fail at the moment of his triumph to realise how considerable that triumph is.

Lest I have left anything out, I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin).

Mr. Devlin: My hon. and learned Friend has dealt in his usual comprehensive way with almost every point. I wanted to draw attention to a clause providing for rules of court to be made. One provision is that rules should be made about a court's ability to say who is and who is not a party to the proceedings and to give them legal representation. That would extend to grandparents. The precise objection of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell)—about grandparents turning up at court and being told that they have nothing to do with the proceedings—has been met entirely.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He points to another excellent reason why the hon. Member for Ogmore should feel well pleased.

There is other work for us to do, so I shall conclude. I think that the Opposition Front Bench support my view that in the Bill we have substantially advanced the cause of grandparents and other close relatives in terms of their ability to participate in hearings about the future of a child whom they love, and to be entrusted with heavy responsibility if that is right in the circumstances. That is a major step forward. If, after the Bill becomes law, and after taking such a great step forward, it appears that there are still deficiencies, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not find many people who would object to further refinements.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will give us the benefit of the doubt on this occasion. I could continue speaking about this matter for a great deal longer, but there would be no advantage to doing so. I hope that he recognises that there have been considerable advances—indeed, a transformation of the rights of grandparents—and the hon. Gentleman has played his part in achieving them. The Bill takes a substantial leap forward, but if, with the benefit of hindsight, it becomes clear that further steps need to be taken, that should more readily be possible because of the great tide of sympathy on this issue. We have gone a great way forward, and I cannot think of any hiatuses. Almost all the examples give by the hon. Gentleman are met by the Bill.

I have no objection to the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's case, but I believe that his points have been incorporated in the Bill. I hope that he will not feel it necessary to press the new clause, but should he do so, and for reasons that I am sure he will understand, I cannot advise my hon. Friends to accept his new clause.

Mr. Ray Powell rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Powell: I regret that you were not in the Chair earlier, Mr. Speaker, so that you could listen to all the debate, but I assume that you were listening elsewhere. I have been fortunate in that you have often been in the Chair when I have spoken about grandparents' rights. You have been most sympathetic in granting a great deal of time to me to elaborate on the issues involved.

In my opening remarks I referred to an early-day motion that was supported by 333 hon. Members—the 11th highest total of signatories since 1926. If the Minister is a democrat and believes in democracy, which I am sure he does, surely he should accept a new clause that embraces the wording of an early-day motion that has been signed by more than 50 per cent. of hon. Members. I would have expected the Minister to be sympathetic towards the incorporation of that early-day motion into the Bill. I cannot understand how he can claim that the Bill embraces the principles of my new clause. That is not the case; the Bill does not give us what we want.

I am grateful for the Minister's explanation. I am extremely grateful to the Committee for its work on extending certain rights, such as naming grandparents. Nevertheless, I am still perturbed. Although grandparents will benefit by substantial advanced rights and naming under the clauses that provide for them to be consulted —which is a great step forward—I remind the Minister that we have been campaigning for that for 10 years.

New Acts have been introduced, but as I mentioned them on Second Reading I do not need to do so again today. Although they embraced children's rights and the rights of child care, they were introduced piecemeal. So we pleaded on Second Reading that this Bill should be all-embracing to ensure that we will not have to come to the House year after year, trying to amend legislation to put right a wrong.

The Minister's final comments were directed to me. He urged me to accept what is already on in the Bill and to wait to see how the legislation works. He said that, if it proved necessary to alter the legislation, we could come back and do so, but that we should see how it worked first. However, if these provisions were enacted now, there would be no need for us to come back in a couple of years——

Mr. Mellor: That is precisely what I am saying. I am sugaring the pill for the hon. Gentleman in case he is doubtful. That is the main burden of my case. Let it be clearly understood that what the hon. Gentleman is asking for today is already, in effect, provided for in the Bill. I put that point to him as plainly as I can.

Mr. Powell: That may be so, but if in 12 months or two years when the Bill is on the statute book, we find that we have to come back on behalf of grandparents to try to change the law because it is not direct enough, it will be on the Minister of State's head. It will be on the Government's head.

If it is the wish of my hon. Friends, I am quite prepared not to force a vote. However, I warn the Minister of State that in all probability—God willing—I will still be around in two or three years' time. If grandparents have the same problems and difficulties as now, and if they still have to call upon the legal profession to help them out of their difficulties, it will be because the Minister of State has not incorporated into the Bill the new clause that I and my hon. Friends are requesting. It will be on the hon. and learned Gentleman's head. It will not matter to me whether he is in the other place by then: he may be the Lord Chancellor, but I will still condemn him for today's performance and for not ensuring that a straightforward new clause was accepted and put on the statute book so that grandparents' rights were protected.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): This has been an excellent debate. The introductory remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) and the subsequent comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) were compelling, moving and realistic. If ever we have heard an argument about agism, that was it. They put their points most effectively.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) mentioned my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney). It reminded me that only a week or so ago the father of my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield—Hugh McCartney, a former Member of the House—came to Twechar in my constituency. It is a mining community with which my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield will have much in common. We were delighted to see him. Incidentally, he is a great-grandparent. The folks at Twechar presented him with a little bronze miner, showing the unity of purpose among my hon. Friends.

In many ways, this has been the year of the grandparent. It was the year when the Prime Minister stood outside No. 10 Downing street, between reshuffles, and announced, "We are a grandmother." Then a few days later, my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor), whose contributions to our discussions on this Bill have been outstanding, announced in the House, "We too are a grandmother." That may well have had an influence on events.

I want to be fair to the Minister of State and to confirm what he has said. It is true that substantial progress has been made towards realising many of the objectives that my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore outlined this morning and for which he has campaigned so nobly for many years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore was absolutely right when he said that we shall watch carefully how the Bill is implemented. The Minister acknowledged the improved access to court proceedings and improved circumstances of care which were achieved as the Bill progressed.

In the spirit of the concluding remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore, which we seriously heed, I believe that it would reflect the wishes of the House if we did not press this matter and, therefore, I seek leave to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Ray Powell: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 34

REMOVAL OF ADULTS

'(1) Where the Court has made

(a) an emergency protection order; or

(b) an interim care order;

and it is satisfied that the child's welfare would be satisfactorily safeguarded or promoted if a person who is resident in the child's household were removed from that household the court may in addition:—

(i) make an order (exclusion order) requiring that person to vacate the household; or

(ii) accept an undertaking from that person that he shall vacate the household.

(2) For the purpose of the section the term exclusion order shall include the term undertaking.

(3) Where an exclusion order is made under this section the child shall not be removed from the household.

(4) Where the court makes an exclusion order under subsection (1)(a) it shall have effect for such period, not exceeding eight days, as may be specified in the Order.

(5) s. 39(2)—(6) shall apply to subsection (1)(a) as if it referred to exclusion orders.

(6) Where the court makes an exclusion order under subsection (1)(b) shall have effect for such periods as are specified in section 35(4)—(5) as if they referred to exclusion orders.

(7) A person who is subject to an exclusion order may apply to the court for the order to be discharged.

(8) Where the court makes an exclusion order the applicant may pay any reasonable expenses incurred by the person subject to the order in connection with this accommodation throughout the period the order is in office.

(9) Where the exclusion order is in force the applicant may make arrangements for the person who is the subject of the order to return to live in the same household as the child provided that the applicant is satisfied that the child's welfare can be satisfactorily safeguarded or promoted as a consequence.

(10) A power of arrest shall attach to all exclusion orders made under this section.

(11) A constable may arrest without warrant a person whom he has reasonable cause for suspecting of being in breach of an exclusion order by reason of that person's entry into the child's household.

(12) Where a person is arrested under subsection (11) above—

(a) he shall be brought before the court within the period of 24 hours beginning at the time of his arrest, and

(b) the court before whom he is brought may remand him.

In reckoning for the purpose of this subsection any period of 24 hours, no account shall be taken of Christmas Day, Good Friday or any Sunday.

(13) Where the court does not exercise its power to remand under subsection (13)(b) nor its powers under any other enactment, it shall authorise the removal of the child from the household unless it is satisfied that the child's welfare can be satisfactorily safeguarded or promoted without its doing so.

(14) For the avoidance of doubt, section 63 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 shall apply to any orders made under this section.'.—[Mr. Tom Clarke.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment (a), in line 4, leave out 'satisfactorily safeguarded or" amendment (b), in line 6, after 'household', insert and Government amendment No. 171.

'and the welfare of any other child resident in that household would not be harmed.'

Mr. Clarke: Given the restricted timetable—I do not wish to reopen the debate on that issue—it was my intention to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to speak to this new clause, but apart from minor contributions later on I hope that we might have a short Third Reading debate. That would allow us to make some important points in the limited time available to us.

The issues raised in new clause 34 were not debated at any great length in Committee. It is therefore important to discuss them now, and, in particular, to discuss the report by the Law Commission that appeared after the committee had concluded its deliberations.

The new clause is important. It is widely recognised that the sudden removal of children from the home is usually a traumatic and distressing experience for them. The purpose of the new clause is to provide an alternative to such removal in child protection cases arising out of an emergency or during the course of care proceedings. It provides that the court may order the removal of an alleged abuser either through a compulsory order or by receipt of an undertaking. The new clause is drafted to reflect the ideas contained in the working paper published in August by the Law Commission on domestic violence and the occupation of the family home.

Throughout the passage of the Bill the Government have expressed sympathy for amendments tabled on the issue of the removal of alleged abusers. In both Houses the Government promised to consider tabling their own amendment, but no such amendment appeared. Subsequently, Government officials have said that no amendment could be considered until receipt of the report of the Law Commission containing its recommendations.

Several meetings have been held with the Minister about this matter and they have been extremely helpful. On 26 September a consortium of local government and voluntary organisations met him to discuss a number of issues relating to the Bill. The Minister said that he was not opposed in principle to compulsory ouster or exclusion orders. I recollect that he agreed to discuss with the Lord Chancellor how the proposals contained in the Law Commission's working paper could be incorporated in the Bill. This morning perhaps we shall hear whether those discussions were productive and about the Government's stance on those matters.

It is true that we are all looking for new remedies for a problem that was a great worry for the Committee. Hon. Members gave examples of the difficulties and heartache for children, for their parents, for their families and, in some cases, for their community when particular circumstances lead to the lengthy removal of children from their home.

The new clause has been drafted so that exclusion orders can be obtained as an addition to an emergency placement order or interim care order. The Law Commission did not think that that was necessary or fair for families and children unless there was a specific provision against the removal of children in such circumstances. However, in Committee on 25 May the Minister strongly expressed the view that removal of abusers should take place only within the context of an EPO. Given the express provision against removal of the child when an exclusion order has been made we can see arguments for exclusion orders to run concurrently with EPOs and ICOs so that provisions for medical direction and contact may also apply.

When this Bill is enacted and this matter is dealt with there may still be a case for even more research. It might not solve the problem to know that an alleged perpetrator has been abused, although it might help, but until we find out precisely what motivates adults to indulge in this sort of child abuse—alas, it is all too common—we shall not have resolved the problem. In addition to responding to the new clause, therefore, I hope that the Minister and his colleagues will feel it possible in due course to embark on even more public debate so that we can consider why such dreadful events take place, based on research that is available to us all.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): I agree in general with the objective that lies behind the new clause whose aim is to avoid removing a child from the family home, so as to reduce the trauma that it suffers. The trauma suffered as a result of being taken away from home often has long-term effects on a child and adds to the guilt already felt.

At the same time, it is important to remember the balance that we are attempting to achieve. The forcible removal of an adult who has not yet been charged with an offence may have detrimental effects on a family. The child at the centre of the inquiry may suffer similar guilt feelings and feel just as traumatised if an adult leaves home as if he had been removed himself—the more so if the child feels responsible for any detrimental consequences to other members of the family.

It is important to remember that we are talking about mothers as well as fathers of children. We should also recall that often only one child is at risk—not the others in the family. It is possible with the right support to resolve some of these cases without removing the child or the suspected perpetrator. That should always be our aim, as I am sure the Minister agrees.

Much depends on the circumstances of the case. I am worried that the new clause may lead to an abuse of this power. The removal of an adult in some circumstances may be seen as a very easy option. I accept that the removal of an adult from the family home is often desirable and may well be the only solution, but there are also circumstances in which that will still have detrimental effects. So I suggest that an adult be removed only if that will promote the welfare of the child.

I hope that when the court assesses the effect on the child's welfare it will consider the context of the family setting. The phrase "satisfactorily safeguarded" is open to too many interpretations. The welfare of the child is paramount but it is sometimes inextricably linked with the welfare of others and it does no good to resolve one problem by creating another. When considering the return of the adult to the household the test does not need to be so stringent because one assumes that the welfare of the child has improved since the removal and that it will be that status which is to be safeguarded.

I hope that I have made it clear that in tabling this small amendment my objective is not to prevent the removal of an adult but to ensure that the court deliberates on the matter of care and to ensure that the power to be given to the courts is not capable of too much abuse even though the decision may be well intended. Those are my reasons for tabling amendment (a).

1.15 pm

Mr. Hinchliffe: New clause 34 is plain common sense. We spent much time on the issue in Committee and in view of the pressure of time in this debate I shall not delay the House for long. My main point is that under the present system of law the alleged victims of abuse are made to feel guilty. That is wrong. The trauma experienced by children and young persons has sometimes to be seen to be believed.

All hon. Members present in the Chamber were present in Committee when I spoke about the case of the girl whom I had to remove following allegations of sexual assault on her sister by the mother's boyfriend. That was a terrible situation and I never want to see anyone go through it again. I recognise that in that case I was removing the wrong person. However, the law as it stands and as, unfortunately, it will continue to stand under the Bill, means that the current situation will continue.

I take seriously the civil liberties question touched on by the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn). I have given a great deal of thought to that matter and I am worried about it, but I come down firmly on the side of the child or young person who is the alleged victim. I say that because such children are often not in a position to understand why they have been removed. They do not understand why they are made to feel so guilty about an apparent break-up of the family and it appears to them that they are being punished for something that they have not done.

When talking about an exclusion order or, as it is sometimes called, an ouster order, we are talking about the removal of an adult who is in a much better position, guilty or not guilty, to understand precisely the reason for the exercise of the power. I come down firmly on the side of defending the child in the home and not removing him to a foster home, a children's home or an assessment centre. I am in favour of leaving children in the home environment and removing the alleged perpetrator of the offence rather than the victim.

I know that there is a wide-ranging support for the new clause. One source of support of which perhaps the Minister is not aware is the Law Society. It has said that it is aware of the fact that exclusion or ouster orders are currently being considered by the Law Commission. The Law Society will be responding to the commission's working paper, but it realises that it may be several years before the deliberations are acted upon. The Law Society says:

"We therefore take the view that some provision needs to be made in the Bill if only as a temporary measure."

I urge the Minister to take the new clause on board. It is sound common sense and will make a great deal of difference to the treatment of many children who are victims of circumstances beyond their control.

Mr. Mellor: I do not think that there is much difference between us on this matter. It comes down to an important technical issue. As I said in Committee and in the various meetings that we have had since, the making of an emergency protection order does not mean that the local authority has to remove the child from the home. It is open to the authority, provided it does so using extreme care and proper professional judgment, to arrange to accept an agreement by the alleged abuser to go so that the child will not be further disrupted by having the link with the abuser broken. Even if that is the right thing to do it sometimes causes trauma to a child. A child should not also lose the link with brothers and sisters who may remain.

I think I said earlier that I am aware of cases in which adults have been abused and have said that being taken away from home seemed like a form of punishment for having been the victims of abuse. That is common ground and we have sought to make it a little easier for the alleged abuser to go by putting into the Bill a provision that local authorities could help with the expenses of that happening in the best interests of the child.

A narrow but difficult point arises out of new clause 34. The Law Commission has published a consultative document on domestic violence and the occupation of family homes. If people have the right of occupation it is not a trivial matter to terminate that right, as the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) rightly said. I should feel more comfortable about proceeding on this once we have received the Law Commission's study and it has had a chance to take on board the points made during consultation. Our resolve to deal thoroughly with the matter is not weakened and we do not preclude considering it when the Law Commission has put forward its final thoughts.

Even without the new clause, the law is now stronger. As a professional who has been involved in this work, the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) knows that a child does not have to be removed simply because a protection order has been made. The abuser can go instead. We cannot add an ouster provision now, without first considering carefully the serious issues raised in the Law Commission's report, and I hope that the House will understand my reasons for not accepting the new clause. I shall be happy to arrange further discussions on the matter as progress is made.

Government amendment No. 171 is important. It picks up a point made by Lord Justice Butler-Sloss in the Cleveland inquiry report. She encouraged social services departments to consider the appropriateness of using their existing powers under section 1 of the Child Care Act 1980, which are designed to prevent the reception of a child into care. Under these powers and for a limited period, they may be able to defray the additional costs incurred by the suspected abuser leaving home on a temporary basis while initial assessment of the child is completed. The power is intended to help with alternative accommodation whether the suspected abuser leaves under voluntary arrangements agreed with the authority under an emergency protection order or an interim care order. Alternatively, it could be used in support of any action taken under existing legislation or a new statutory scheme introduced as a result of the Law Commission's work. The provision oils the machinery satisfactorily, as we await the outcome of the Law Commission's deliberations. I hope that the House will agree to amendment No. 171 and that the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) will not press his new clause to a Division.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 240.

Schedule 9A

JURISDICTION

PART I

GENERAL

Commencement of proceedings

1.—(1) The Lord Chancellor may by order specify proceedings under this Act or the Adoption Act 1976 which may only be commenced in—

(a) a specified level of court;

(b) a court which falls within a specified class of court; or

(c) a particular court determined in accordance with, or specified in, the order.

(2) The Lord Chancellor may by order specify circumstances in which specified proceedings under this Act or the Adoption Act 1976 (which might otherwise be commenced elsewhere) may only be commenced in—

(a) a specified level of court;

(b) a court which falls within a specified class of court; or

(c) a particular court determined in accordance with, or specified in, the order.

(3) The Lord Chancellor may by order make provision by virtue of which, where specified proceedings with respect to a child under—

(a) this Act;

(b) the Adoption Act 1976; or

(c) the High Court's inherent jurisdiction with respect to children, have been commenced in or transferred to any court (whether or not by virtue of an order under this Schedule), any other specified family proceedings which may affect, or are otherwise connected with, the child may, in specified circumstances, only be commenced in that court.

(4) A class of court specified in an order under this Schedule may be described by reference to a description of proceedings and may include different levels of court.

Transfer of proceedings

2.—(1) The Lord Chancellor may by order provide that in specified circumstances the whole, or any specified part of, specified proceedings to which this paragraph applies shall be transferred to—

(a) a specified level of court;

(b) a court which falls within a specified class of court; or

(c) a particular court determined in accordance with, or specified in, the order.

(2) Any order under this paragraph may provide for the transfer to be made at any stage, or specified stage, of the proceedings and whether or not the proceedings, or any part of them, have already been transferred.

(3) The proceedings to which this paragraph applies are—

(a) any proceedings under this Act;

(b) any proceedings under the Adoption Act 1976;

(c) any other proceedings which—

(i) are family proceedings for the purposes of this Act, other than proceedings under the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court; and

(ii) may affect, or are otherwise connected with, the child concerned.

(4) Proceedings to which this paragraph applies by virtue of sub-paragraph (3)(c) may only be transferred in accordance with the provisions of an order made under this paragraph for the purpose of consolidating them with proceedings under—

(a) this Act;

(b) the Adoption Act 1976; or

(c) the High Court's inherent jurisdiction with respect to children.

(5) An order under this paragraph may make such provision as the Lord Chancellor thinks appropriate for excluding proceedings to which this paragraph applies from the operation of any enactment which would otherwise govern the transfer of those proceedings, or any part of them.

Hearings by single justice

3.—(1) In such circumstances as the Lord Chancellor may by order specify—

(a) the jurisdiction of a magistrates' court to make an emergency protection order;

(b) any specified question with respect to the transfer of specified proceedings to or from a magistrates' court in accordance with the provisions of an order under paragraph 2, may be exercised by a single justice.

(2) Any provision made under this paragraph shall be without prejudice to any other enactment or rule of law relating to the functions which may be performed by a single justice of the peace.

General

4.—(1) For the purposes of this Schedule—

(a) the commencement of proceedings under this Act includes the making of any application under this Act in the course of proceedings (whether or not those proceedings are proceedings under this Act); and

(b) there are three levels of court, that is to say the High Court, any county court and any magistrates' court.

(2) In this Schedule "specified means specified by an order made under this Schedule.

(3) Any order under paragraph 1 may make provision as to the effect of commencing proceedings in contravention of any of the provisions of the order.

(4) An order under paragraph 2 may make provision as to the effect of a failure to comply with any of the provisions of the order.

(5) An order under this Schedule may—

(a) make such consequential, incidental or transitional provision as the Lord Chancellor considers expedient, including provision amending any other enactment so far as it concerns the jurisdiction of any court or justice of the peace;

(b) make provision for treating proceedings which are—

(i) in part proceedings of a kind mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b) of paragraph 2(3); and

(ii) in part proceedings of a kind mentioned in paragraph (c) of paragraph 2(3), as consisting of proceedings of one or other of those kinds, for the purposes of the application of any order made under paragraph 2.

(b) family proceedings within the meaning of Part V of the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984.".—[Mr. Mellor.]

Clause 16

DAY CARE FOR PRE-SCHOOL CHILDREN

Amendment proposed: No. 44, in page 12, line 31 leave out 'they consider' and insert 'is'.—[Mr. Mellor.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 46 to 48.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): I intervene now although my comments also apply to later amendments, clause 64 and schedule 8. I wish to deal with the age at which the Government accept responsibility for registration of children's day care schemes. I am pleased that in these amendments the Government have raised the age from five to eight, but I am disappointed that they have stopped at the age of eight. Children over eight are still at a vulnerable age and can be exploited easily. As has been said in a previous debate, some wicked people may have motives that are difficult to detect before the event. Nevertheless, we must be vigilant. We are concerned that by raising the age limit to only eight years the Government are not allowing for the vigilance that we feel is necessary. Our argument applies wherever in the day care arrangements the Government are raising the age of responsibility from five years to eight. We would have wished the limit to be raised to 14 years. This is an issue to which we shall have to return.

Mr. Mellor: I accept that there is a genuine difference between us. The hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) has properly put her argument before the House. I shall not repeat the reasons why the Government have taken the view that they have. Among the many things that we agree about, the issue remains a piece of unfinished business and a difference between us.

It was remiss of me not to have said initially that the amendment reflects an argument advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims). I promised to consider it, and as has happened so often during the progress of the Bill, having considered the argument I found that I agreed with it. I hope that my hon. Friend is satisfied.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 45, in page 12, line 35, after 'including', insert 'training'.

Having disappointed the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) on one point, I can tell her that the amendment before us is the equivalent of one which she moved in Committee. I found her arguments persuasive and the amendment reflects them.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 46, in page 12, line 40, leave out from 'care'" to 'form' in line 42 and insert 'means any'.

No. 47, in page 13, line 3, leave out 'they consider' and insert 'is'.

No. 48, in page 13, line 9, leave out from '(7)' to end of line 14 and insert 'In this section'.—[Mr. Mellor.]

Clause 17

REVIEW OF PROVISION FOR DAY CARE, CHILD MINDING ETC.

Amendment made: No. 293, in page 13, line 17, after 'authority', insert 'in England and Wales'.—[Mr. Mellor.]

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 49, in page 13, line 18, leave out from 'provision' to end of line 19 and insert

'which they make under section 16'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 50, 51 and 374.

Mr. Mellor: The amendment reflects an undertaking given in Committee which I am glad that we have been able to honour.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 50, in page 13, line 21, leave out 'five' and insert 'eight'.

No. 51, in page 13, line 24, leave out 'five' and insert 'eight'.

No. 374, in page 13, line 24, after 'persons', insert 'other than the authority'.

No. 294, in page 13, line 26, leave out 'this section' and insert 'subsection (1)'.

No. 295, in line 28, at end insert—

'(2A) Every local authority in Scotland shall, at least once in every review period, review—

(a) the provision for day care within their area made for children under the age of eight by the local authority and by persons required to register under section 64(1)(b); and

(b) the extent to which the services of child minders are available within their area with respect to children under the age of eight.'.

No. 296, in line 29, after 'authorities', insert 'or, in Scotland, the authority'.

No. 52, in line 30, leave out 'five' and insert 'eight'.

No. 297, in line 33, leave out 'in England and Wales'.

No. 298, in page 14, line 6, after 'health authority', insert 'or health board'.

No. 363, in line 7, at end insert—

'(7) In the application of this section to Scotland, "day care" has the same meaning as in section (Application of Part X to Scotland) and "health board" has the same meaning as in the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978.'.—[Mr. Mellor.]

Clause 18

PROVISION OF ACCOMMODATION FOR CERTAIN CHILDREN

Amendment proposed: No. 53, in page 15, line 7, leave out subsection (9) and insert—

'(9) Subsections (7) and (8) do not apply while any person —

(a) in whose favour a residence order is in force with respect to the child; or

(b) who has care of the child by virtue of an order made in the exercise of the High Court's inherent jurisdiction with respect to children, agrees to the child being looked after in accommodation provided by or on behalf of the local authority.

(9A) Where there is more than one such person as is mentioned in subsection (9), all of them must agree.'—[Mr. Mellor.]

1.30 pm

Mr. Hinchliffe: The clause and the amendment deal with a child's removal from voluntary care. I argued in Committee—the argument was supported by the NSPCC —that while the clause places a duty on a local authority to ascertain and consider the child's wishes and feelings before it provides accommodation, there is no comparable duty on a local authority or parent to consider the child's wishes before he or she is removed from the accommodation. I and others said in Committee that the child could be unhappy about leaving at short notice or about the arrangements which have been made. The Bill takes children's well-being and personal wishes a good way forward in law and it is unfortunate that the clause cannot be said to be a full part of that process. I shall be grateful if the Minister will undertake to consider the matter and, if possible, ensure that amendments are tabled in another place.

Mr. Mellor: I shall consider the matter and advise the hon. Gentleman on where we should go from here.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 19

GENERAL DUTY OF LOCAL AUTHORITY IN RELATION TO CHILDREN LOOKED AFTER BY THEM

Amendment made: No. 54, in page 15, line 45, at end insert 'and linguistic'.—[Mr. Mellor.]

Clause 20

PROVISION OF ACCOMMODATION AND MAINTENANCE BY LOCAL AUTHORITY FOR CHILDREN WHOM THEY ARE LOOKING AFTER

Amendments made: No. 55, in page 16, line 17, at end insert—

'in other respects apart from providing accommodation for him'.

No. 56, in page 17, line 3, at end insert—

'(5A) Subject to any regulations made by the Secretary of State for the purposes of this subsection, any local authority looking after a child shall make arrangements to enable him to live with—

(a) a person falling within subsection (4); or

(b) a relative, friend or other person connected with him, unless that would not be reasonably practicable or consistent with his welfare'.—[Mr. Mellor.]

No. 57, in page 17, line 8, leave out 'any' and insert 'the'.—[Mr. Mellor.]

Clause 21

ADVICE AND ASSISTANCE FOR CERTAIN CHILDREN

Mr. Hinchliffe: I beg to move amendment No. 488, in page 17, line 36, at end insert—

'(2A) Each local authority shall

(a) keep a register of all persons qualifying for advice and assistance within its area

(b) cause persons on that register to be visited by a person authorised by the authority once every six months.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 455, in page 18, line 15, after 'assistance', insert—

'(6A) In each application for assistance under this section the local authority shall:

(a) decide whether to provide the help which has been asked for;

No. 489, in page 18, line 22, after 'section', insert

', or whose name is listed on the register kept in accordance with subsection (2A),'.

Mr. Hinchliffe: The amendments deal with the position of children leaving care. In the last few days, a report has emerged that is very critical of the arrangements made by local authorities for young persons leaving care. Those criticisms apply right across London local authorities, regardless of their political control. The year-long study carried out by Lucy Bonnerjea for the London boroughs children's regional panel says that "there is no local authority which in practice smooths the way out of care for all young people."

I am very concerned—this is a major issue in west Yorkshire—at the fact that, on leaving care, many young people find their way on to the streets, into prostitution and into other undesirable circumstances. I commend the work of the Yorkshire Evening Post, which recently published a series on the teenage vice trap, exposing the way in which young people who have been in care or with difficult family circumstances find their way on to the streets.

Yesterday, during our debate on the guillotine motion, I said that I had spoken earlier this week to a probation officer from the Dewsbury area who had told me about a young client who, because of the Government's benefit changes, has ended up on the streets. That client has had to work as a prostitute to earn money to buy furniture for her flat. Such claimants can no longer get the grants that were previously made available by the Department. We must ask ourselves why young people find themselves in such circumstances.

One of the main reasons is the direct responsibility of the Government, who have changed the benefit arrangements for young persons. Vast numbers of people aged 16 and 17 no longer qualify for any benefit. Even though some changes have been made, the problem remains very serious. I note that the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) has tabled an amendment, No. 362, which would require local authorities to pay benefit. I realise that the hon. Gentleman's motives are honourable, but his amendment is yet another example of local authorities being required to pick up the tab and do what the Government used to do, and what they should continue to do, for young people who have left care.

I am especially concerned about the benefits issue. I know that the Government have re-examined their views on the issue of legitimate reasons for a child leaving home, but problems remain. The Government's review of social security did absolutely nothing to help young people under the age of 18 who cannot live at home. They are eligible for income support for 12 weeks if they leave school at Easter or for 16 weeks if they leave school in the summer but thereafter their income support ceases and their case has to be reconsidered by the Minister. That is crazy. There are numerous cases in which such ministerial discretion will be required. Surely it must be wrong to treat vulnerable young people who are difficult to place more harshly than others who live in the more satisfactory home environment.

Another problem that applies to many young persons is related to the level of personal allowances. Before April 1988, the scale rates for householders on supplementary benefit were the same irrespective of age. Since April last year, however, young people having to live independently receive personal allowance at only 58 per cent. of the full adult rate. By agreeing to pay independent 16 to 17-year-olds the same rate as those aged 18 to 21, the new review raised that proportion to 79 per cent. But the lower rate for the 18 to 21-year-olds is itself based on the proposition that they are not fully independent from their parents. The fact that 16 and 17-year-olds have to demonstrate their independence from their parents to get any benefit makes paying them less than the full adult rate nonsense. Such circumstances are leading young people into taking desperate measures and, in some areas, on to the streets.

What about young people who started on YTS but who have dropped out or have been dismissed? Not every young person entering training has had the educational background or security enjoyed by hon. Members' most of who have had reasonable family backgrounds. The current rules allow a bridging allowance of £15 a week for up to eight weeks a year as long as the young person is willing to take another YTS place when it becomes available. The reduction to £15 a week may well act as a salutary lesson for a 17-year-old living at home but if that person is living independently through no fault of his own, he will be required to make up his money in other ways. That is driving young persons into undesirable circumstances. Right hon. and hon. Members will also be familiar with the problems arising from the abolition of board and lodging payments, but we will debate that aspect later.

On leaving care, many young persons find themselves in a number of undesirable circumstances. A large proportion of those from my constituency end up in London or in other major cities, well away from the places where they have lived all their lives. They lose contact with their families and their home environment and get into enormous difficulties, and may engage in male or female prostitution.

The amendment requires local authorities to establish a register of young people aged between 16 and 21 who have been in their care and to make contact with them at least twice a year. That would in effect continue the review process that is built into existing law. Such an arrangement will allow young people to receive such assistance and advice as may be necessary. Many young people leaving care will progress satisfactorily and may want nothing to do with social services, but others will welcome being contacted and assisted by a social worker.

That proposal will make further demands on the resources of local authorities, particularly in making contact with social services departments in other parts of the country, as is required by amendment No. 489, in respect of the notification procedure. However, there are good reasons for that requirement. The young person leaving care is at a difficult stage in his or her life. Benefit changes have distinctly worsened the chances of their progressing successfully, and I hope that the Minister will see the sense of the amendment and support it.

Mr. Mellor: There is certainly a role for local authorities, and the Bill imposes one on them. In the guidance issued to local authorities, emphasis will be placed on the need to ensure that young people are made fully aware of the local authority support that is available to them—particularly in cases where the young person has no other responsible adult to whom he or she can turn.

The amendment goes too far, because it amounts to imposing a much greater duty, by requiring a local authority to satisfy itself as to whether every young person up to the age of 21 needs to be advised or befriended. The hon. Gentleman is rightly concerned always about imposing extra burdens on local authorities, but his proposal would impose too great a burden. Provided that the local authority makes available information about its services, there is no harm in making the young person responsible for seeking assistance.

The hon. Gentleman's other arguments are primarily points for the Department of Social Security, and I shall ensure that his comments about benefit arrangements are brought to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 58, in page 18, line 16, leave out 'this section' and insert 'subsections (1) to (6)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to debate Government amendments Nos. 59, 375, 60 and 61.

Mr. Mellor: These amendments are important because they reflect my commitment in Committee to introduce a specific power to enable a local authority to provide financial assistance to those who have left its care and are seeking or are engaged in employment, or are receiving education or training.

The Child Care Act 1980 contains such a power, but we have taken the oportunity to extend its scope and application. The new power will apply to all young people qualifying for advice and assistance, as defined in subsection (2).

Paragraph (a) of the proposed new subsection will enable local authorities to provide young people with financial assistance to help them to meet the cost of accommodation when it is associated with employment or the seeking of employment, or with receiving education or training. Paragraph (b) enables grants to be made to meet expenses associated with education and training—for example, to purchase books and other educational materials, or tools, in the case of those learning a trade. As from July this year, that form of financial assistance will no longer affect the level of income support that a young person may receive.

This is another of the issues on which the Opposition will inevitably feel that we have not gone far enough. I feel, however, that it is a significant step forward, and I hope that—even if they do not agree with every material particular in this highly contentious sphere—Opposition Members will at least feel that it is worth endorsing.

Mr. Rowe: The Government have moved a considerable distance from their original position, and I am grateful for that. What I had in mind was to challenge slightly the definition of "exceptional circumstances". I believe that, in a number of ways, many young people leaving local authority care lag behind their contemporaries from a more stable and settled background. They will be less mature, and often less confident in their ability to establish personal relationships. Failure to retain a place on a youth training scheme or in a job, for instance, may well have much more to do with that than with any malice aforethought or deliberate incompetence. If we are to stick to the idea that the local authority is really acting as a parent, we must be sure that ability to provide financial assistance is not interpreted too narrowly.

I fully understand that it is much easier for a hard-pressed social worker to hand out money than to go through the difficult and time-consuming business of ensuring that a young person is not merely regarding him as a soft touch, but is busily engaged in trying to grow up. Nevertheless, I hope that the Government will consider carefully what is meant by "exceptional circumstances".

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 59, in page 18, line 17, at end insert—

'(7A) A local authority may give assistance to any person who qualifies for advice and assistance by virtue of subsection (2)(a) by—

(a) contributing to expenses incurred by him in living near the place where he is, or will be—

Clause 33

EDUCATION SUPERVISION ORDERS

Mr. Fearn: I beg to move amendment No. 473, in page 28, line 38, at end insert

'either by regular attendance at a school or otherwise'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 474, in page 29, line 26, at end insert—

'(9A) Where a local education authority proposes to make an application for an education supervision order they shall—

(a) advise parents of their rights and options under the law with specific reference to section 36 of the Education Act 1944; and

(b) where applicable allow a reasonable time limit for the provision of "otherwise education".'.

No. 475, in page 103, line 23, at end insert—

'(aa) to inform the child and his parents of their rights and options under the law relating to education;'.

Mr. Fearn: I am glad that you have seen these amendments, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as you missed my other amendment, No. 481. They have been tabled on behalf of the Children's Home-based Education Association.

The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that any action taken by education officers is in keeping with section 36(5) of the Education Act 1944, which gives parents the duty and the right to ensure that their child is educated by attendance at school or otherwise. It is the "otherwise" element of the clause that is relevant here because it means that parents have a right by law to educate their children in the home or by some other means than regular attendance at school.

Problems with education arise in various ways. A parent may be unhappy with the lack of basic education in a particular school. The child's potential may be unfulfilled, or it may have special needs, or suffer from school phobia—a real condition which causes sheer panic. Sometimes there is a situation in the home or elsewhere that affects the child's attendance at school.

A parent's first course of action when a problem arises is usually to approach the school. That is not always successful, whereupon the local education authority is called in, either at the parents' or the school's request. It is here that there is often a lack of communication which ends up with the child, or the parents, becoming the subject of a court case, with the threat of a care order.

An article that first appeared in an "Education Otherwise" newsletter explains what could happen when matters get to that stage:

"To encourage children to attend school, our LEA has been experimenting with the procedure of repeated adjournments in the Juvenile Court. Each time the child appears, and it may be at intervals of a week, a fortnight, or more, depending on progress, the child's attendance is reviewed. If attendance has not improved, an interim care order is made as an 'encouragement' to attend school. If this does not work, a full care order is made. The chairman of the magistrates tells the child in no uncertain way of the consequences of poor school attendance, stating, 'Next time bring a bag with your night things. You'll be going away'."

To me that extraordinary system is unnecessary and a great waste of Government and court resources. Much heartache caused by children being taken into care for non-attendance at school could be avoided if parents were informed of their rights and given a reasonable amount of time to set in motion plans for alternative means of educating their child.

[Mr. Fearn]

Under the law, parents are perfectly within their rights to educate their children at home even for short periods and, if they were advised of the help and support groups that can assist them, many of the problems could be wiped out and the child could return to school. That is a more sensible approach. We need to get away from the idea that if children are not educated in school then they must be up to no good. The Government go some way to recognising that by introducing an amendment referring to the place of education rather than just to the school. The main purpose must be to inform parents of their rights before it becomes necessary to take out a supervision order. Earlier and better communication, information and advice will result in fewer problems and is the better way to protect the interests of our children.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) for moving his amendment and recognising that in part we have already tabled our own amendments to try to meet his points. Amendment No. 473 is unnecessary because the existing wording in clause 33 does not specify where proper education should take place and does not exclude education outside the school setting. Therefore there is no conflict with the provisions of the Education Act 1944, which provides for some children being educated outside school, subject to the overriding necessity that the child receives a suitable education.

On amendment No. 476, we accept that the Bill as presently drafted could imply that education wholly equates with schooling. That was not the Government's intention, so I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for pointing it out. His amendment No. 191 clarifies that point.

Amendment No. 474 would require local education authorities, before applying for an education supervision order, to advise parents of their rights under education law. That amendment is not necessary, because a court cannot make an education supervision order if the parents are fulfilling their duty under the Education Act to ensure that their child is being properly educated. In making the decision, the court would consider representations by the parents and the local education authorities.

Amendment No. 475 would require supervisors—where an education supervision order is in force—to give the child and the parents details of their statutory rights and options. However, it would not be practicable in statute to impose a blanket requirement to give information about the range of educational rights and options. In suitable cases, where parents have expressed a wish to educate their child outside a school setting, the supervisor would—as a matter of good professional practice—make relevant information available to them.

I hope that I have given the hon. Gentleman information that enables him to further advise the groups with whom he has been discussing the matter. Obviously, if they feel that there are continuing problems, I should be glad to hear from him. I hope that amendment No. 191 has cleared up the one loophole revealed by the hon. Gentleman, and that he will not seek to press his amendment.

Mr. Fearn: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Mellor: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In order that we might have time for a Third Reading debate, an indication has been given that the remaining Government amendments could be moved en bloc. Also, hon. Members who have tabled their own amendments have agreed not to move them. I hope that that will meet with your approval.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Given the circumstances, I willingly agree to that suggestion, as it would be helpful in terms of procedure. I know that the Minister and the House will not take that as a sign that the Opposition endorse every dot and comma.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If no hon. Members objects to proceeding in that way, I will put the remaining Government amendments en bloc.

Amendment made: No. 83, in page 29, line 17, leave out from 'shall' to 'before' in line 19.—[Mr. Mellor.]

Order for Third Reading read.

1.54 pm

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I hope that my colleagues do not mind me going in to bat first in this Third Reading debate, but I want the opportunity to say how grateful I am to all hon. Members who have worked with me on the Bill, preparing it and advising us on it for all that they have done.

As I have said throughout the Bill, and it bears repeating one last time, it is not every day that one gets the chance to have a comprehensive reform of private and public law on children. It has been a major undertaking which has required the codification of a significant body of statute law and major reforms to that law to produce very substantial advances. For example, the law relating to the protection of abused children has been changed, as have the rights of other family members including grandparents and others that we discussed earlier today. Quite fundamental changes have been made to court procedure and other issues of law.

Therefore, I say with sincerity to those of my officials who have worked so hard on the Bill that they have carried out a herculean task with great patience, as have those outside the House who have helped and advised us. While I know that one or two of them feel a little dissatisfied with certain points, I believe that the overwhelming feeling will be that Parliament has done a good job. I hope that that does not sound complacent, but I believe it to be the case. I am grateful to them for helping us to do a good job.

I should also like to thank my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for his stalwart assistance in all stages of the Bill, and I should very much like to thank the Opposition for the manner in which the Bill has been conducted.

It has been a real pleasure and a privilege to work with the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on the Bill, because narrow partisan motives have never intruded in his consideration of the matter. It struck a blow for the ability of Members of Parliament to work together in that, notwithstanding our differences on other political issues, we were able to sit down together and have joint meetings with some of the interest groups. That shows Parliament at its best. While it is very important for people in politics to know when they disagree, and not to be afraid to say so, it is equally important that people know that there are issues which can bring us together. The leadership of the hon. Member for Monklands, West, assisted by the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) has been exemplary. I should like to thank all the Opposition Members for their help, including the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) and the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones). I do not think that anyone could feel that their views had been shut out or who will not feel some pride in our collective achievement.

Obviously, what we have done goes for the other place. We have sent back a whole raft of amendments, but that reflects the seriousness with which we have considered the Bill, and the seriousness with which the other place started consideration of the Bill. I believe that the Bill returns to the other place the better for its Commons consideration, and I hope that those in the other place will forgive us for the volume of amendments and recognise that, with any luck, not only have we managed to make the policy lines in the Bill better, although in every particular we have not gone as far as the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) would like. However, thanks to the stalwart work of the parliamentary draftsmen, to whom great thanks are due, we have gone through the Bill ironing out little verbal infelicities and problems that can sometimes make lawyers a great deal of money if they slip into the finished product.

I conclude with a personal word. It has been my privilege during my time as a Minister to participate in a great deal of legislation. I remember with particular affection those on which the House was able to work together on a shared endeavour. I think particularly of working on the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986 with certain Opposition Members, including the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell). That was an important Bill which is standing the test of time. The same was true of the work on the Animals (Scientific) Procedures Act 1986 which has managed to give us the most modern system of animal law on the vexed, difficult and emotionally troubling subject of animal experiments. If those Bills are good, it is not because of anything that I did, but because hon. Members, with a few exceptions, joined to work sensibly on them. The Children Bill will join that little Pantheon as a happy experience for me.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I thank the Minister for his kind and generous remarks. I associate myself and my hon. Friends with the thanks that he offered to his officials and to the voluntary organisations. The voluntary organisations did much work and showed much commitment throughout our proceedings. Some of them may be disappointed, but none should feel that any hon. Members believe that they gave less than their best. I was delighted by the Minister's comments about the other place. It is not often that hon. Members can truthfully say that we are sending back a better Bill for the other place to consider.

I shall not rehearse the arguments about the guillotine, although I regret that I was not present for that debate. It is fair to say that the skill of the Minister for Health—the hon. and learned Gentleman was extremely skilful, as was the Solicitor-General, whatever disagreements I may have had with him—was not reciprocated by his ministerial colleagues. The Minister for Health will not complain, but I think that I am entitled to do so on his behalf. Given the time that the Minister spent on the Bill, whatever arguments we may have had about the guillotine it is overwhelmingly clear that the Government's legislative machinery was overloaded this Session. The noble Lord Whitelaw was certainly right about that.

It is remarkable that the Bill has reached its present stage. In all candour, given that there is such a gulf of philosophy between the Government and the Opposition, and given the constraints of time, it is remarkable that we are endorsing a Bill which represents such consensus. Future historians may find that a remarkable achievement.

It is appropriate to repeat hon. Members' comments when they acknowledge the input of the Select Committee on Social Services, which used to be chaired by one of our former colleagues, Renée Short. It is a tribute to her and to her colleagues that they campaigned for many of the measures now in the Bill. The Minister will agree that her plea from the heart that future legislation should not be implemented in dribs and drabs should be acknowledged by the House. I am sure that the Minister will not mind if I pay tribute to my hon. Friends. In presenting the Labour party's views and policy, they did a service to Parliament and to the nation. They will agree that when the Bill is enacted, it will represent a framework for future legislation.

The Minister rightly said that the Bill does not go as far as we should wish in many respects. That was self-evident from our debate on family courts. As to children's rights, there is a case for the appointment of independent persons and for complaints procedures. My hon. Friends look forward to the time when we have a children's ombudsman, and I believe that the case for that has been made.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), who unfortunately has had to leave our proceedings having once again made an excellent contribution, raised the issue of training. Training is essential to reach all the objectives which hon. Members have set and which are included in the legislation.

Despite the Minister's clear co-operation, the House is bound to want to monitor how well the assessment orders work. That is important, especially in view of our complex discussions. In time we will want to look again at the ouster orders which were debated, albeit briefly, this morning and the important issue of termination of voluntary care.

It is appropriate that I should ask the Minister to give a commitment—if not this afternoon, then fairly soon—about the implementation dates that the Government have in mind. We understood earlier that they were thinking of April 1991, but more recently we have heard about autumn 1991. [Interruption.] I am grateful for the correction. Perhaps what was said the other night was a slip of the tongue as well.

On the issue of inspection of recreation and play areas, the amount of £10 was mentioned. If the Minister finds time, we should like to know whether that covers inspection as well as costs.

Some elements of the Bill have not yet taken into account some of the strong representations made to us. The representations that we received, especially from young runaways, made me feel that their plight was the most moving of any of the issues that were put to us during the Bill's passage. I hope that it will be seriously considered.

I know that there may be a struggle between the various Departments represented in the House and the Treasury, but resources are essential if the Bill is to have meaning. There is an acute shortage of social workers in many parts of the country. It is vital that those resources are made available for other aspects of social services and education.

On Second Reading I endeavoured to outline the simple fact that family life as we once understood it did not necessarily exist today. There are a huge number of single-parent families. There have been changes which suggest that society is changing. I hope that the Bill will reflect those changes and respond to the challenges.

My hon. Friends the Members for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong), for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding), for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), for Eccles (Miss Lestor), for Wakefield and for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) have made a major contribution to our discussions, and I thank them. I hope that in time, after we have listened to those responsible for the Bill's implementation, to children, families, parents and carers, legislation even more progressive than the Bill will be produced.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) is present because he provided distinguished chairmanship of the Committee. Both sides of the House have been conscious of the sensitivities of children who, in many cases, are the most vulnerable in our society. We have tried to reflect that concern.

I know that my hon. Friends will approve if I say that it is, perhaps, appropriate to end my speech with a quotation from my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East. Although he is not present, he has shown a great interest in the Bill. On Second Reading he quoted Charles Dickens:

> "In the little world in which children have their existence, whomsoever brings them up, there is nothing so finely perceived or so finely felt as injustice."

If, through this Bill, we have managed to remove some of those injustices, the whole exercise has been more than worthwhile.

2.11 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): My hon. and learned Friend the Minister was kind enough to refer to some of the outside organisations which have been interested in this measure. As a member of the central executive committee of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, it might be appropriate if, on its behalf and that of all the other organisations involved, I reciprocated and told my hon. and learned Friend how grateful they are to him and his officials for the way in which they have co-operated in producing the Bill. As an hon. Member who has served in Committee on this Bill, in turn I should like to thank all those organisations for keeping us acquainted with their views, which has assisted us in improving the Bill. I am sure that the House will understand if I make particular mention of Avril Wilson, who has quite literally been here day and night briefing Members of both Houses and of all parties.

We have sought, through the Bill, to achieve a balance between the rights of children, the rights of parents and, of course, the duties of the state. Perhaps it is the latter that is the most difficult to define and the most sensitive to administer. In what circumstances should the state intervene in family matters in the shape of a local authority social worker or an NSPCC officer? I hasten to add that an NSPCC officer is not an agent of central or local government; but, uniquely, the Bill gives such an officer similar powers to those of a local authority social worker. I hope and pray that we have the balance right. I hope that we have made it clear when and how such intervention should take place.

Our task will soon be completed, but that of the practitioners in the field has barely begun. They have to translate our words into actions—both those who administer social work and the social workers in the field. Let us be under no illusions; changes will cost money. It is essential that the resources are made available for the implementation of the Act. The figures quoted in the preamble to the Bill are, I am pretty sure, not a maximum estimate, so at least that amount will be needed.

We must remember that social workers are human beings and, like all of us, occasionally make mistakes and misjudgments. That is especially true as they are dealing with people who, perhaps, have more than the average quota of weaknesses and are sometimes unpredictable and unstable. Mistakes are bound to happen. I fear that the Bill cannot entirely remove the possibility of further cases of the kind that have featured in our discussions, but I hope that there will be far fewer of them.

The Bill will soon be an Act and our job will be done. Others will have the task of learning the changes and additions that have been written into the law and will have to put them into practice in their everyday work. As they do so, they can be certain that our thoughts, prayers and good wishes will be with them.

Mr. Fearn: There is no doubt that the Bill is to be welcomed. It brings together many different areas of both public and private law relating to children. Its central theme is the interests and welfare of children. That is what we have all had at heart. The objective is to achieve that through a balance between a child's right to be protected and the rights, responsibilities and duties of parents and the state.

During our proceedings, there has been a consensus and a willingness to co-operate from all sides. A tremendous number of amendments have been tabled at all stages. Some were accepted by the Government and many were withdrawn on promises of consideration by Ministers. In many instances, the Government have honoured their promises and have tabled amendments to cover such points. I believe that that is what has happened in relation to grandparents' rights. However, not all the Government's amendments have been completely satisfactory and a few have upset the balance in favour of intervention. Nevertheless, on the whole the result is welcome.

One of our main complaints relates to the speed with which the Bill has passed through the House. Some crucial Government amendments were tabled at a very late stage, making it difficult for us to assess their full implications. I know that the people responsible for the children's lobby are exhausted. The number of amendments tabled and selected on Report highlights the amount of work and effort that has gone into the Bill.

The Bill is obviously a vast improvement on the present legislation, but it is a great shame that such legislation, which is so important to the welfare of our children, did not include that all-embracing item for which hon. Members of all parties have been crying out. I refer to a family court system. That is to be regretted. Nevertheless, the Bill has almost got it right and I am pleased to see its historic passage today.

2.16 pm

Mr. Rowe: Although I welcome the Bill hugely, one is bound to feel some disappointment that one intractable problem has still not been dealt with satisfactorily. I refer to what are usually known as fathers' rights. It is still too easy for children to slip away from one parent and it is often extremely difficult for that parent to have access to those children. Although the Bill has done its best to address that difficult problem, I am sure that the House will have to return to it.

I pay warm tribute to the voluntary organisations that have done so much work. The way in which they have worked together is a model which I very much hope that the voluntary sector will take on board for our discussions on the White Paper on community care. The same collaboration throughout the voluntary sector will improve the debate enormously.

Finally, we have all been concerned with the casualties of society and the Bill is an attempt to provide a more just way of dealing with those casualties and to strengthen some of the bulwarks against them ever happening. One of the great issues of the next decade will be how we are to create the kind of society that will make it easier for parents to discharge their responsibilities in such a way that there will be no need for state intervention. We shall have to consider how we, as a society, are responsible for all our children.

2.18 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) who was right to say that the Bill is a consequence of the many tragedies to which we have referred throughout our proceedings. Those of us who followed the Cleveland child abuse crisis, such as the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin), were always struck by the way in which it brought about new events and new circumstances beyond anyone's imagination. Indeed, who would have imagined that this week, when dealing with the Children Bill, we would have learnt so much about the Associated British Ports Bill? Who would have imagined that in the middle of a debate on a guillotine motion my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), whom I am pleased to see in his place, would announce the resignation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? It was kind of him to do so. Even the new Foreign Secretary, who writes thriller novels, could not have written a script more perfect and more full of whodunnits than the events that occurred last night.

The Minister of State was kind enough to refer to the variety of Bills on which it has been a pleasure to work with me, but he did not mention the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which was one of the earlier Bills on which we worked together. There were 69 sittings of that Committee, but I will not go into the connotations of 69 as my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clark) is sitting on the Front Bench. We changed the law in such a way, however, that cases such as the Guildford Four might not happen again.

Clause 1 talks about the interests of the children being paramount. That is absolutey right and essential. Lord Justice Butler-Sloss said in her report:

"A child is a person and not an object of concern".

We must all agree with that.

Clause 2 deals with parental responsibility. I agree with the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) that we must get the balance right between the rights of children and of their parents. The Bill goes some way to achieving that end. My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) will be happy that clause 9 enables grandparents to apply for a section 7 order at any time, provided that they first get the court's permission by showing that they have good reason. Grandparents will almost certainly expect to be allowed to make representation under the new complaints procedure in clause 23 relating to access to children. My hon. Friend must feel a great sense of satisfaction at some of the changes contained in the Bill.

The hon. Member for Chislehurst also referred to social workers and the great responsibility that they bear. I refer again to the Butler-Sloss report which stated:

"no single agency—Health, Social Services, Police or voluntary organisation—has the pre-eminent responsibility in the assessment of child abuse generally and child sexual abuse specifically. Each agency has a prime responsibility for a particular aspect of the problem. Neither children's nor parents' needs and rights can be adequately met or protected unless agencies agree a framework for their inter-action. The statutory duties of the Social Service Departments must be recognised".

[Mr. Stuart Bell]

Social workers therefore, will not be obliged to take full responsibility. The hon. Member for Chislehurst also mentioned the family court and on that the Butler-Sloss report noted:

"We recognise the considerable procedural advantages of the ability to move cases at any time from one tier of the Court to another, which would be achieved by the setting up of a Family Court."

We have not got a family court from the Bill, but as the Solicitor-General knows, we have unified jurisdiction under new clause 1. We also welcome the child assessment orders contained in new clause 13. They will be a new tool for social workers and we are pleased to note that clause 38 and the emergency protection orders get rid of the dreaded place of safety order which was used to such ill effect in Cleveland. We also welcome the rights of access contained in the Bill.

The final debate on the final day of our deliberations on the Children Bill takes place during the mid-term holiday and children are able to follow our proceedings. Recently I reviewed a book about children who had been abandoned throughout the ages. The message of the Bill is that we are not abandoning children's or parents' rights. We are seeking, with foresight rather than with hindsight, to look to the future. I am glad to have been part of the parliamentary team that considered the Bill, which now goes back to the other place before appearing on the statute book.

Mr. Devlin: I commend this excellent Bill to the House and to the country. We nearly lost it earlier in the week and it is with a sigh of relief that I note that it is now moving safely out of the House into the other place before proceeding to the statute book. The Bill is long overdue and its effects are much awaited.

As I come from Cleveland it was an especial honour to serve on the Committee. During my first year in Parliament I was witness to much suffering, which will now be alleviated by the measures we have introduced. It is of particular pleasure to me that the place of safety order has been abolished and the emergency protection order has been introduced along with a number of new measures, not least those pertaining to grandparents. The most beautiful part of the Bill, however, is that the interests of the child are paramount. That is stated unequivocally at the beginning of the Bill.

I pay tribute to the officials who served the Committee so well and to all the voluntary organisations—particularly Peter Smith of the family courts campaign—which have been of great assistance to members of the Committee and of the all-party children's group headed by Baroness Faithfull. I also pay tribute to the one unsung hero who has not been mentioned today—the Chairman of the Standing Committee——

Ms. Armstrong: He has been mentioned.

Mr. Devlin: I refer to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James), who may have been mentioned when I stepped out to answer the phone. This is a subject close to his heart.

It has been of great interest to me go serve on a Bill which until recently was approached in a non-partisan way. I have a high regard for many Opposition Members who served on the Standing Committee, so it was with some regret that I learnt from the Middlesbrough Evening Gazette yesterday that I had been criticised by the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) for failing to support an amendment on family courts, since I gave clear and good reasons for doing so.

The Bill goes from here to another place with a large number of amendments. I know that their Lordships will welcome it even though they are going bananas about the amount of work that they will have to do.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): I am glad to wind up a debate on what has been a happy Bill and to which, I am the first to acknowledge, all sides of the House have greatly contributed. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) for the major contribution that he and the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) made to our common objective.

The hon. Member for Monklands, West was kind enough to say that if we had had our differences we had made them up, and I concur with that. It is curious that our differences were due to a common over-enthusiasm to reach our goal and the speed at which we could properly reach it.

I join other members of the Committee and my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State in thanking the officials who gave us so much help throughout the Bill and the outside organisations which played such a constructive role in its creation. My part has been to deal with the early clauses, which cover crucial aspects such as the fact that the welfare of the child should be paramount, as the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) said, and important concepts to do with parental responsibility, which should never be forgotten. All too often we deal with problems because parental control and responsibility have broken down.

The one great area of debate on Report was the family court. On that we are divided not as to objectives but merely as to the speed and means at which we should reach them. We can congratulate ourselves, however, on having created a unified body of child law which will apply at every level—to the High Court, to the family division in the county courts and in the magistrates courts. That paves the way for a unified jurisdiction, with the possibility of cases moving from the magistrates courts up to the county or high courts and commencing at, or rapidly moving to start at, the appropriate level for their decision.

By creating this model and sending it back to the other place, we can say that we have created what may prove to be a model for a wider form of family court of the future, once the important reports from the Law Commission and from other bodies—and the important report from Newcastle university on conciliation—have had time to be properly digested.

As for how long all this will take, I confirm what I said the other day—the Bill should be up and running in the next two years, so by the autumn of 1991 we should be well down the road. I hope that that is of assistance—

Mr. Devlin rose——

The Solicitor-General: No, I shall not give way to my hon. Friend, who is looking at the clock with all the intelligence that he usually brings to these occasions.

I am glad to commend the Bill on Third Reading to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 1st November, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 15 (Prayers against Statutory Instruments, &c. (negative procedure)), if proceedings on the Motion in the name of Mr. Neil Kinnock relating to the National Health Service have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall at Seven o'clock put the Question thereon.—[Mr. Sackville.]

Opencast Mining (Derbyshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sackville.]

2.29 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): This debate is the story of two opencast sites, one of which was proposed before the last general election and which was to be near the villages of Clowne and Barlborough in my constituency, known hereafter as the Slayley site. The second one is the subject of another application by the Opencast Executive of British Coal for further opencast mining in part of Barlborough but in the main in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes).

We all know that in the past few years there have been many pit closures. We also know that the nation has enough deep-mine coal for 300 years and that it can be used by the nation to offset balance of payment deficits and to support the economy. As a result of pit closures in the past few years, much of that coal has been sterilised because when pits are shut and people are thrown on the dole, the opencast mining that is allowed strips off only about 25 per cent. of the total amount of coal available. The remainder of that coal could be made available by deep mining.

That is not the only problem with opencast mining. It affects the environment as well. We hear much talk in the House about the environment, but my constituents are fed up to the back teeth with the Opencast Executive being granted permission by the Government, even after appeals, to opencast in and around rural villages causing dust and noise and massive movements of lorries. There is also a loss of jobs.

In December 1986 Derbyshire county council turned down an application for the Slayley site. It was supported by Bolsover district council, Clowne parish council, Barlborough parish council and parish councils in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East. All the communities in north Derbyshire and Bolsover opposed that application. Local democracy got to work and meetings of several hundred people took place in the villages. They talked about what would happen if the opencast mining application was granted. It would have meant the extraction of 300,000 tons over 200 acres and 100 lorry movements every day. The Monnies ancient burial site would have been ripped apart and it would have destroyed the wildlife and fauna in the vast areas around Barlborough, Clowne and Renishaw. The noise would have been horrific throughout the five years of extraction and over the period of the second five years when they started to take the clay.

Opencast mining makes a great big hole and creates vast profits, principally for the contractors. Many people within and outside the country, some of them with great big tankers, are only too anxious to fill those holes with toxic waste. That is why Derbyshire county council was careful to say in its objections that not only would opencast mining be detrimental to the amenity and the environment, but that the exposed clays which underlie the coal might be considered as a possible site for the dumping of nuclear waste. Therefore, we had a multitude of reasons for opposing the application. I opposed it and so did all the people in the community. Not only would it cause much environmental change but it would also create a possible site for toxic waste or become a nuclear dump.

We had an inquiry because British Coal decided to appeal against the decision of Derbyshire county council and the other local authorities. We went to the inquiry with a great deal of confidence. People from the villages turned out in their hundreds and put the case before the inspector who was sent from the Department of the Environment. After several days the report went back. The inspector's report said that because this was a relatively built-up area, the noise levels would have to be such that British Coal could carry out opencast mining for only 11 seconds per day. Naturally, British Coal said that it could not mine coal on that basis because it was uneconomic, so the villagers and local democracy in the area of Bolsover and north-east Derbyshire triumphed. That was in July 1987 and the report was issued shortly afterwards, to the villagers' jubilation. Then the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), now Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, was replaced as Secretary of State for the Environment in the Cabinet reshuffle—not the one yesterday but the one in July this year—by the so-called green and friendly Environment Minister, the right hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Patten). Meantime British Coal asked for the conditions to be varied so that it could opencast the site and get ahead with this massive operation. The previous Secretary of State accepted his inspectors' report about allowing mining for only 11 seconds per day. What did the new Secretary of State do in his first week in his job? Contrary to all the talk on the television and articles that have been written about him, the new, green Secretary of State overturned the decision and allowed British Coal to opencast despite the conditions that had been put on it. That was a savage decision. In view of his reputation, it would have been decent for the Secretary of State to have said, "No, I shall send this back for a further appeal. I intend to have this examined so that local democracy can play a part in the new decision before I agree to British Coal's variation of the conditions." Instead, he trampled all over the civic rights of people in Barlborough and Clowne. No inquiry was allowed and the so-called green and friendly Secretary of State, despite all the talk that we have heard about him, allowed British Coal to go ahead.

It is time that we spoke the truth in this place. We hear a lot about the environment and about the new society of the 1990s. We hear how the Government intend to look after the interests of those who live in the green belt, but this is part of the green belt. It is one thing for the new Secretary of State for the Environment to overturn decisions about the green belt in Tory-held constituencies and get praise from Tory Members. Yet in Labour-held constituencies such as mine and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), it is a different story altogether. He is not worried about the green belt in Bolsover, Barlborough, Clowne, Renishaw, Killamarsh, Slayley and in my hon. Friend's constituency. He is happy to let British Coal take its massive machines into those areas and create all the noise and dust possible.

British Coal, not content with asking for the conditions to be varied and agreed by the Government, decided to use a further application called the Pinnock application. Pinnock is mainly in my hon. Friend's constituency. He, like me, opposes opencast mining. He had a discussion with me and one or two others and we brought a massive petition to the House some time ago objecting to the application. Nearly everybody in the area objected and both my hon. Friend and I objected as Members of Parliament.

We want this deputy Subbuteo who has been sent to look after the Secretary of State's interests to go back to the Secretary of State and tell him, "You did wrong to allow the conditions to be varied. You have not played the game by the people living in Barlborough and Clowne. You ought to do the decent thing and turn down the Pinnock application when it comes to the Department, as it will after it has been to the appeal and the inspectors." He should say that despite the decision made in July in respect of Slayley, the job has not been done properly. The Government should allow the people in the villages to take part in the Slayley decision rather than proceeding in such a heavy-handed and bureaucratic manner.

We have the Pinnock site, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East will refer if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is a massive site. There are about 40 million tonnes of coal stocked in Britain, so there cannot be such a great need for more coal. However, the Government want to line the pockets of their friends and so they are engaged in opencast mining.

We are seeing the prelude to privatisation. If the Conservative party is successful at the next general election, which is unlikely after yesterday's debacle, what better can it do than to say to its friends that the Government will privatise the coal industry where it matters—not all of it—and give them the juicy bits? They will be able to say that their green and friendly Environment Minister has allowed applications for opencast mining in all the coalfields of Britain in the past few months, including north Derbyshire.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): And my area.

Mr. Skinner: Yes, Nottinghamshire too.

British Coal is in league with the Government and is piling up a list of applications for opencast mining so that their friends can make money hand over fist. I am talking about the large combines that make money out of opencast operations. When that part of the industry is privatised, it will be a much juicier operation.

We have a new application for Pinnock. What does it mean? It means another 15,000 tonnes of coal. With a 66-hour week, a 32-tonne load will be leaving the site every eight minutes of the 12-hour working day. There will be a further 200 lorry movements on the Worksop road, which runs through my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East.

The game is all about making money without taking any notice of the environmental concerns of those who live in the areas affected. The game also includes privatisation. Despite all the unco-ordination between the Prime Minister and the Treasury, the Departments of Energy and of the Environment are working hand in glove.

We know that a short while ago the conditions were varied for applications for opencast mining. My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East will remember that the rules were changed and district and county councils told that when they received planning applications for opencast mining they should take into account market requirements as well as lorry movements and normal planning conditions. That was part and parcel of a plan to shut more deep mines and to introduce opencast mining on a fairly massive scale. This means short termism. It is easy to exploit opencast coal, but that means that 75 per cent. of the coal, which would otherwise be mined by deep-mine methods, will be sterile for ever so that instead of 300 years of coal we shall be talking about 50 or 60 years.

The Minister has been sent here to do the dirty work on behalf of his gaffer. We say that he should refuse the Pinnock application when it arrives on his desk, assuming that an appeal takes place. We have harnessed local opinion at parish, district and county level. My hon. Friends and I have canvassed all the local authorities. We are asking them to understand that there is plenty of coal in Britain and that they should respect the civic rights of those who live in the area of Barlborough and Clowne. The Minister should remember that there is a green belt in north Derbyshire and other coalfield areas, just as there is in Surrey and other posh areas of suburbia. The Minister must recall the Slayley application, despite the decision taken in July, and reject it. The issue should be referred back to the people who live in the area and who will be affected.

The Minister will have his say shortly, and I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East wants to say something, too. I have no doubt that my argument could be repeated by almost every hon. Member who lives in a coalfield area. We are fed up to the back teeth with opencast mining. In my constituency alone, there are about half a dozen rubbish dumps and potential toxic waste and nuclear dumps as a result of opencast mining developments. When they extracted the coal at Morton, they dumped dioxins. In other areas they use opencast sites for all kinds of other toxic waste. A firm in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East which deals in toxic waste is all too ready to dump it in opencast holes. People will make money out of opencast mining and even more money by filling the holes with toxic or nuclear waste.

The Minister has a duty to the nation, not just to the plush parts of Surrey and Sussex where the Tory constituencies lie. I know that Tories in those areas are trying to save the necks of their Members of Parliament but Ministers are supposed to be national Ministers and look after interests throughout the land. The Minister should begin by accepting the conditions and proposals that I have advanced today.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): It is a pleasure to have the opportunity to speak in at least one debate to be answered by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State. I hoped to speak on the ways and means resolution on the Football Spectators Bill earlier today but before I got a chance to say anything someone went and moved the closure on us.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) on introducing this debate on a topic that is important to my constituents in north-east Derbyshire. As my hon. Friend said, a large part of the Pinnock development would fall within north-east Derbyshire—to the north of Mastin moor and over to Renishaw, where Renishaw Park pit has just been closed. Mines are being closed and opencast is taking over from deep-mined coal. That is an addition to the danger of coal imports under the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill —the Humber ports Bill—against whose advance a vigorous battle is being conducted in the House.

On 13 June 1988 I presented to the House a petition from the people of Mastin moor, who stressed many of the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover. Those points were not fully answered in the supplement to the Votes and Proceedings, in which responses to petitions are given. On 13 July the Department gave a brief reply to the effect that because the proposal was going through the usual procedures the Secretary of State could not comment as this might prejudice the outcome. We now have the opportunity to hear a response to the points made in the petition.

The petition stressed the danger of subsidence in the area, which has been mined in the past. Opencast developments often upset the land, and that is likely to affect people's homes. Because of the disruption that opencast mining causes, it may make the area unacceptable as an area in which to live, and the value of people's homes will then be seriously affected. The problems of noise, dust and pollution stressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover were also of concern to my constituents and they were worried about the effects of the development on wildlife in the area. We are talking about people who live in industrial areas but who at present have access to the green belt which allows them to get away from the collieries and industries in the area. That green belt area would be affected by the development.

In addition to the problems arising from heavy traffic, serious problems may arise from dust. Evidence from Wales shows that people living in areas affected by dust may suffer from lung problems. I have a map from the Opencast Executive showing all the areas in north-east Derbyshire that it finds of interest in terms of development. It shows not only Pinnock but massive other areas, including those which have coal seams but are not the site of former pits. Many rural and middle-class areas would be hammered by the future development that Pinnock would open up.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover mentioned that some sites could be used for the dumping of toxic waste and he described the dangers that could arise. We are particularly aware of that danger in north-east Derbyshire. Leigh Environmental, which operates a plant at Killamarsh, was at the forefront of the attempts to permit the Karen B to dock in Britain and to allow the dangerous materials it was carrying to be dumped in this country—some of which might have been deposited in a built-up area in my constituency while they were in transit. Such matters are of concern not only to my constituents in the Mastin moor area but to other people living in north-east Derbyshire.

2.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): I reject the argument made by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) that Ministers are unaware of the impact of opencast mining on the green belt and of the problems outside the Surrey countryside. As I represent an inner-city seat—Lewisham,

[Mr. Colin Moynihan]

East—suffering from serious socio-economic deprivation, the hon. Gentleman knows only too well that that is not the case.

The hon. Member for Bolsover explained his concern with characteristic vigour, and I congratulate him on bringing the subject before the House—not least because I had the opportunity yesterday to study the matter in detail in Wakefield, where a Labour city council has responded effectively to the environmental problems that are posed by many opencast and derelict sites, and to the need to be environmentally sensitive, in terms of investment and of working effectively with British Coal.

The Government recognise that although mineral working is a temporary use of land, it can have a serious impact on the environment. At the same time, minerals are essential to society and to the national economy, and it is a geological fact of life that such mines can be worked only where they occur.

It is the job of the planning system to strike a balance between the need for the mineral, and the environmental and other considerations involved. The Government's planning policy on opencast coal is explained in more detail in "Minerals Planning Guidance Note 3", published in May of last year. The guidance note sets out the national policy framework within which each application must be considered and it provides advice to mineral planning authorities on the balance that should be struck between the social and economic benefits of that low-cost energy source and the protection of the environment.

As opencast coal is one of the cheapest forms of energy available to the country, it is in the national interest to maximise production, when that can be done in an environmentally aceptable way.

There is no Government target for coal production or opencast output. That is properly a matter for the market place to determine. It is for the industry to decide the level of opencast output that it needs to achieve in any set period, but it is for the appropriate mineral planning authority initially to determine the acceptability of specific projects—having regard both to the benefits to be gained from opencasting and to the environmental and other material considerations relative to a specific site. Ultimately, if the case comes before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on appeal or call-in, he will decide it on its relative merits—as he did in respect of one of the examples quoted in the debate.

The Government aim at encouraging a positive and constructive approach by the mining industry and mineral planning authorities, to ensure that that important energy resource is extracted in an environmentally acceptable way. The guidelines give clear advice on how that should be achieved.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the environmental impact of opencasting. We are concerned that questions of noise, dust, traffic and other effects are fully considered. "Minerals Planning Guidance Note 3" provides advice on how those impacts should be handled by mineral planning authorities. The environmental effects of opencasting can be considerable, and developers need to demonstrate that those effects can be kept down to an acceptable level. The effects of noise, dust, vibrations from blasting and the movement of traffic can be minimised by careful planning of the site layout—for example, by the arrangement of physical baffles and by moving work away from residential areas quickly.

Planning conditions are also important—for example, to control noise aspects. The guidance recognises, however, that in some cases those factors will produce such a severe effect on the environment and the quality of life locally that planning permission should not be given. All those aspects need to be carefully considered by the authority concerned. The acceptability of opencasting will depend in part on the likely environmental impact, and on the extent to which the effects can be minimised.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that sites can be restored to a high standard and, in some cases, can provide positive improvement in the landscape through the clearance of dereliction. The Government take the question of restoration very seriously. Planning permissions for mineral extraction should contain stringent conditions, many of them imposed to ensure a high standard of restoration and aftercare of the site. We recently published guidance for mineral planning authorities on the best practice regarding the reclamation of mineral workings, and the important role that good reclamation can play in securing the environmental acceptability of mineral working.

I hope that the House will forgive me for not having addressed the issue of the green belt in sufficient detail during this brief speech: time presses.

I know that discussions are currently taking place between Derbyshire county council and the British Coal Corporation about an application to opencast coal in an area known as the Pinnock site, and that statutory consultations have been carried out. It is, of course, open to the hon. Gentleman and his constituents to make their views on the application known to the mineral planning authority at the appropriate time, and I urge them to do so.

Mr. Skinner: We have done so.

Mr. Moynihan: I am glad of that, because I am sure that the authority will give careful consideration to all aspects of the application, including the representations made by the hon. Gentleman and his constituents. That is essential.

The hon. Gentleman has urged me to intervene in this case. Perhaps it would be helpful if I explained the Government's policy on call-in. It has long been established policy for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State not to intervene in the jurisdiction of planning authorities unless it is absolutely necessary for him to do so. That is an important principle: Parliament has given clear responsibilities to local planning authorities, and it would be entirely wrong for my right hon. Friend to interfere unnecessarily in the development control process.

My right hon. Friend will therefore continue to be very selective about calling in cases for his decision, and applications will be called in only if issues of more than local importance are involved. Such cases may include those which, in my right hon. Friend's opinion, have wide effects beyond their immediate locality that give rise to substantial regional or national controversy, and contict with national policy on important matters. In this case it seems from the information available to us that the issues involved—while undoubtedly of considerable concern locally, as the hon. Gentleman has pointed out—do not raise issues of regional or national importance. Derbyshire county council is therefore the appropriate authority to deal with the application.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand that I am unable to comment on the relative merits of an individual planning application. There is always the possibility that Derbyshire county council will refuse planning permission, in which event it would be the prerogative of the applicant—the British Coal Corporation—to lodge an appeal, which would come before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for a decision. I can, however, assure the hon. Gentleman that in that eventuality all aspects of the case would be fully considered.

The hon. Gentleman has also raised the important issue of the Slayley site, and has written to my right hon. Friend on a number of occasions about a redetermined noise condition. Planning permission for opencast operations and ancillary works on the Slayley site was granted on appeal by my right hon. Friend on 14 December 1987, in accordance with the recommendation of the appointed inspector who had previously held a public local inquiry. Subsequently, an appeal was lodged with my right hon. Friend for the alteration of the noise condition. In accordance with the normal practice, an inspector was appointed to carry out a site visit, consider representations and prepare a report with recommendations. The inspector recommended that the appeal be upheld subject to altered conditions on noise, and my right hon. Friend issued his decision allowing the appeal on 10 August this year.

Parties are consulted again only if my right hon. Friend wishes to take into account any new evidence. That was not the case with the Slayley noise condition; the noise issue was discussed fully at the public local inquiry. Consultation in such circumstances would have been inappropriate and irrelevant, as there was no appeal by way of a High Court challenge during the six-week statutory period.

I fully understand and appreciate the concern of the hon. Gentleman and his constituents about noise levels from the workings, and I will be happy to respond in writing to the points with which I have not had time to deal today. I am sorry that time has prevented me from doing so.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Three o'clock.

PRIME MINISTER

European Social Charter

Q25. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the progress made in implementing the social charter directives.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The European Commission's proposal for a charter of social rights has not been agreed by the Council of Ministers. There have so far been no proposals for directives.

Cenotaph (Illumination)

Q99. Mr. Hanley: To ask the Prime Minister if she has made arrangements for the Cenotaph to be illuminated in time for Remembrance Sunday.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The experimental lighting we have seen recently will become permanent well in time for Remembrance Sunday. I am sure that the House will join me in congratulating my hon. Friend on his suggestion last year which prompted such a pleasing enhancement of this very special monument.

Cathedrals

Sir Charles Morrison: To ask the Prime Minister what consideration she has given to the possibility of Government assistance towards the maintenance and repair of British cathedrals.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

Government expenditure on the maintenance of historic buildings in England is channelled through English Heritage. Its policy is to focus financial support on parish churches rather than cathedrals and is based on the Church of England's own view that cathedrals are better placed to raise funds from public and private sector appeals. Should English Heritage or the Church of England consider changing this policy, and should the changes have implications for English Heritage's overall grant-in-aid, the Government would carefully consider any case put forward. A similar policy is adopted by the Welsh Office and regularly reviewed.

A different approach, however, is adopted by the Historic Buildings Council for Scotland since, of the 25 'churches' with cathedral status, only four are considered to be cathedrals in scale. It is considered unlikely that, were the cathedral status churches to be threatened, they could be assisted wholly by funds raised through public appeals and private donations. Consequently, cathedrals are considered for historic buildings repair if all the normal eligibility criteria are met. Since 1978, when a scheme of historic building repair grants for churches in ecclesiastical use was set up, repairs to nine Scottish churches with cathedral status have attracted grant.

Nuclear Weapons, Middle East

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if, during her meeting with King Hussein of Jordan on his visit to London, she discussed (a) the dangers of nuclear weapons based in the Middle East, (b) Israel's possession of nuclear weapons capability and (c) initiatives that could be taken before and at the fourth review conference of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, to reduce nuclear weapons proliferation problems in the Middle East.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

No.

Engagements (Japan)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list in the Official Report all her engagements for each day of her visit to Japan.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

During the Prime Minister's visit to Japan from 19 to 22 September, her engagements were as follows:

19 September

Meeting at Tokyo University with Professor Arima, President of the University, and three colleagues conducting environmental research.

Call on Mitsui Bank, Hibiya, to see use of British Telecom and Reuter equipment in the foreign exchange dealing room.

Reception with the British associations in Tokyo.

Dinner at the Ambassador's Residence for senior Japanese politicians and businessmen.

20 September

Visit to Fujitsu computer factory, Numazu.

Lunch hosted by Japan's economic organisations, speech on "the Open World Economy".

Official talks with Japanese Foreign Minister, Mr. Nakayama.

Visit to Tokyu Department Store, to see Laura Ashley shop and tea room.

Official talks with the Japanese Prime Minister, Mr. Kaifu.

Joint television broadcast with Mr. Kaifu, on the environment, education and democratic values.

Working dinner with Mr. Kaifu.

21 September

Meeting with former Japanese Prime Minister, Mr. Takeshita.

Visit to Jaguar Japan at Shimbashi.

Opening of British School Tokyo, and visit to adjacent Shibuya Girls High School and kindergarten.

Visit to British Council.

Luncheon with His Majesty The Emperor and other members of the Imperial Family at Akasaka Palace.

Press conference.

Meeting with Japanese Minister for International Trade and Industry, Mr. Matsunaga.

Reception at the International Democratic Union Conference.

Meeting with United States Vice President, Mr. Quayle.

22 September

Wreath laying at the Commonwealth War Graves Cemetery, Hodogaya.

International Democratic Union Conference.

Ministerial Statements

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Prime Minister what standing instructions she has given to Ministers of the Crown concerning attributable statements of Government policy, or announcement of specific ministerial decisions, by civil servants; what changes have been made in this respect from the practice of previous administrations; and if she will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

When civil servants make such statements or announcements they do so on behalf of Ministers, and Ministers are accountable for them. This arrangement has also applied during previous Administrations.

Visit (Japan)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Prime Minister which Ministers from (a) the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and (b) the Department of Trade and Industry accompanied her on her visit to Japan.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

No Ministers accompanied my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on her visit to Japan.

Rain Forests

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what action she proposes to take to protect indigenous rain-forest peoples.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

We believe it important that all people, including the indigenous inhabitants of rain-forests, should participate in national development as equal partners.

The Government bring their influence to bear in this respect especially in the World Bank and OECD. We also use our influence when we finance projects which protect rain-forests. We are planning an increased programme of aid for conservation and management of forests.

Ombudsman (Appointment)

Sir Antony Buck: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement concerning the appointment of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and the Health Service Commissioner for England, Scotland and Wales.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

In accordance with section 1(3) of the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967, section 106(3) of the National Health Service Act 1977 and section 90(3) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978, Sir Anthony Barrowclough will be retiring from these offices on 2 January 1990.

I am sure that all Members of the House would wish me to express their gratitude and admiration for the very able and thorough manner in which he has fulfilled these duties over the last five years.

Her Majesty has been pleased to approve the appointment of Mr. William Kennedy Reid, CB as Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and Health Service Commissioner for England, for Scotland and for Wales with effect from 3 January 1990.

Engagements

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 October.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 October.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 October.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 October.

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 October.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 October.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 October.

Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 October.

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 October.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is attending the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Kuala Lumpur.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Development Administration

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many United Kingdom consultants the Overseas Development Administration has commissioned in each of the past five years; what was the number of Scottish-based consultants; what was the total value of the commissions in each year; and what proportion of that value in each year was won by Scottish-based companies.

Mrs. Chalker: The total expenditure on consultants commissioned by the Overseas Development Administration in the last five years was:

1985	30·0
1986	33·0
1988	48·5

We do not have statistics for numbers of consultants commissioned in this period, nor are records kept of the geographical base of consultants. I regret, therefore, that this information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Amazon Region, Colombia

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has given the Colombian ambassador about his request to provide some professional expertise for the large research projects on the Amazon region of Colombia.

Mrs. Chalker: I have told the ambassador that we understand from the National Planning Department in Bogota (the agency with which our aid programme in Colombia is agreed), that it did not intend to ask for our help in this project at this stage. But I have asked our embassy to discuss the ambassador's proposals further with the National Planning Department, to see whether it would wish to give them higher priority in future years.

ENERGY

Sizewell C Power Station

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received during the recess about the Central Electricity Generating Board's application to build Sizewell C power station in Suffolk; and if he will make a statement about a public inquiry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend has received approximately 50,000 objections to this application. My right hon. Friend has still to receive the views of the relevant local planning authorities. If either objects, my right hon. Friend will be obliged to hold a public inquiry. Even if they do not, he may still decide to do so in the light of the other objections received.

TRANSPORT

East London River Crossing

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library copies of correspondence between his Department and Messrs Halcrow concerning the East London river crossing.

Mr. Atkins: It is not our practice to publish correspondence between the Department and its agents. If the hon. Member has any particular matter in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what investigations have been made concerning the effects on the river regime, silt depositions, and scouring, and the consequences for dredging costs arising from construction of the new design of bridge for the East London river crossing.

Mr. Portillo: On our behalf, Hydraulics Research Ltd. completed a desk study of the likely effects of alternative bridge designs on the river regime as part of the review of the Thames bridge design. The results of the desk study are contained in annex F of the July 1989 report by Sir William Halcrow and Partners into the alternative forms of bridge design, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Hydraulics Research is now carrying out model studies into the location and effect of scour, change in siltation and in flow distribution to confirm the findings of its desk study.

London Underground

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make a statement concerning the implications for passenger safety of the extension of one-person operation on the deep level tube sections of the London Underground;

(2) if he will place in the Library copies of the correspondence concerning consultations between London Underground Ltd and the railway inspectorate on proposals for extending one-person operation on the tube railways of London.

Mr. Portillo: Extension of one-person operation is primarily a matter for London Underground Ltd,, which has a statutory obligation to operate its services safely. There is, nevertheless, full consultation between London Underground Ltd and the railway inspectorate about the safety aspects of one-person operation proposals. The inspectorate would keep me informed about any proposal with which it was not satisfied. I am content with this arrangement and see no need for copies of correspondence to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action has been taken by the railway inspectorate to implement recommendation No. 131 of the Fennell report on the King's Cross line, requiring it to enlist outside advice in respect of one-person operation of trains in deep tube tunnels.

Mr. Portillo: The railway inspectorate, with the assistance of the Health and Safety Executive and the London Fire Brigade, undertook an investigation into the management of safety on the London Underground earlier in the year. Since the Fennell report was concerned with safety at stations, the investigation concentrated on the safety of passengers and staff in stations. It did not address the question of one-person operated trains. My right hon. Friend the member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) the then Secretary of State for Transport, announced on 24 May that he was that day publishing the inspectorate's report of the investigation, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to when and how London Underground Ltd, in accordance with recommendation 148 of the Fennell report, informed the travelling public of its intention to extend one-person operation of tube trains.

Mr. Portillo: London Underground Limited made it clear, when accepting recommendation 148 of the Fennell report, that information on safety performance would be transmitted to the London Regional Passengers' Committee from time to time; and that it would also mount publicity campaigns about specific safety issues as appropriate. It is for London Underground to consider the extent and timing of any publicity which it considers to be appropriate in relation to one-person operation of tube trains.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the safety audit committee of London Regional Transport, established consequent to recommendation 79 of the Fennell report, has within its responsibilities or terms of reference the level of platform staffing on stations and the planned extension of one-person operation of tube trains in London.

Mr. Portillo: The terms of reference of the safety audit committee are contained within the London Regional Transport document "Management of Safety", a copy of which was placed in the Library on 6 February 1989. They cover wide aspects of safety throughout LRT.

Marine Office, Belfast

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has for the future of the Department of Transport marine office in Belfast; what is the rate per hour which people in Northern Ireland pay to this office for surveys; and if he will make a statement about future charges for these surveys.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have no proposals to change the status of the Department's marine office in Belfast. The complement of the office is kept under review in the light of the workload. The various fees currently payable for surveys in the United Kingdom and abroad are set out in the Merchant Shipping (Fees) Regulations 1989 (SI 1989 No. 323). The regulations are reviewed annually.

Vessels (Defence)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many British-owned vessels are registered under flag-of-convenience terms in the Bahamas; and what are the terms of his agreement with the Government of the Bahamas for use of these vessels for defence purposes.

Mr. McLoughlin: One hundred and fourteen British-owned trading ships (excluding Hong Kong-owned ships) are registered in the Bahamas. A copy of the agreement with the Commonwealth of the Bahamas concerning the availability of British-owned ships to HMG in the event of hostilities is being sent to the hon. Member. A further copy has been deposited in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a table showing merchant vessels available for defence purposes in each year from 1985 to the nearest available date; and if the table will distinguish between vessels registered in the United Kingdom and those registered in dependent territories.

Mr. McLoughlin: This information is contained in "Defence Statistics" table 1.3 in the "Statement on Defence Estimates 1989" (Cm. 675-II) a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library. Separate figures are given for the vessels registered in the United Kingdom and those registered in Crown dependencies and dependent territories, except for 1985 for which only United Kingdom-registered figures are available.

Merchant Fleet

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a table showing United Kingdom merchant fleet manpower in each grade in each year from 1975 to the nearest available date.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information requested is as follows:

	Officers	Ratings	Cadets	Total
1975	35,815	33,524	7,094	76,433
1976	35,123	31,644	6,970	73,737
1977	34,144	29,856	6,708	70,708

Note:

These numbers are based upon the General Council of British Shipping register for the years indicated as available for employment in National Maritime Board agreements with GCBS members or associates. They include foreign seafarers on NMB agreements. About 5,000 foreign seafarers serve on GCBS-registered vessels but probably fewer than 1,000 are under NMB conditions. The figures exclude seafarers employed by United Kingdom companies which do not use GCBS manning services; the latest estimate for these is 6,000.

Merchant Shipping

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the results of NATO's study of supply and demand for merchant shipping in crisis and war.

Mr. McLoughlin: The study is due to be completed early in 1990. Publication of the results will be a matter for decision by NATO.

Diesel Fumes

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will review the effectiveness of the law governing the emission of diesel fumes from vehicles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The Government keep diesel emissions under constant review. Regulations have recently been made that apply for the first time limits on the emission of carbon monoxide, oxides of nitrogen and hydrocarbons from new heavy diesel vehicles. The Commission is expected to make proposals shortly to introduce a second stage of limits on these emissions from heavy diesels and to set particulate limits for these vehicles for the first time. The United Kingdom has taken a leading role in helping the Commission to prepare a draft directive.

The annual tests for buses and heavy goods vehicles include a visual check on smoke density. Over the past two years the Department has increased substantially its programme of roadside checks on the condition of goods vehicles. This also includes a check on smoke emissions. We are considering how future emission standards might most effectively be enforced.

Marchioness Inquiry

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the official inquiry into the Marchioness tragedy will be able to take into consideration any proposal for permanent restriction of navigation through any existing, or proposed, Thames bridge, including proposals for uni-directional movement through any one span.

Mr. McLoughlin: The inquiry into the loss of the Marchioness is still under way. The possibility of restricting navigation under River Thames bridges is one of the matters which is being considered.

Docklands Light Railway

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to the possible extension of the Docklands light railway from Becton to Thamesmead via a planned Thames crossing, including provision in such a crossing of a single, dual directional, line of rail.

Mr. Portillo: There are no plans for an extension of the Docklands light railway from Beckton to Thamesmead via the proposed east London river crossing. London Regional Transport do however plan a bus station at Gallions reach on the DLR Beckton extension which will provide a good interchange with buses serving Thamesmead via the river crossing.

North Devon Coast

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations has he received over reduced levels of safety off the north Devon coast during 1989; and what remedial action he intends to take.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received 17 such representations. The points raised have been answered and he is satisfied that the current facilities for co-ordinating maritime search and rescue operations off the north Devon coast are adequate to meet the rescue needs of the area.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment has he made of the adequacy of the actual level of manning at coastguard headquarters, Swansea, and of the cover over the North Devon coastline by day and by night.

Mr. McLoughlin: All assurances given at the time of the announcement of the Swansea/Hartland merger have been met. The staffing level at Swansea has been increased and since the merger the number of persons on watch has not fallen below four. This is adequate, as are all the current facilities for co-ordinating maritime search and rescue operations off the north Devon coast whether by day or night.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to ensure the adequacy of the actual level of manning at coastguard headquarters, Swansea, and over the north Devon coastline by day and by night.

Mr. McLoughlin: Following the Swansea/Hartland merger on 6 December 1988, staffing levels were increased to reflect the area now covered by the Swansea centre. At no time since has the number of persons on watch fallen below four persons.

An additional coastguard sector officer has been stationed in the Hartland area and the auxiliary coastguard rescue companies in the area remain unaffected by the merger. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is satisfied with these arrangements and that the current facilities for co-ordinating maritime search and rescue operations off the north Devon coast are adequate to meet the rescue needs of the area.

Street Lighting

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give, for the last five years for which figures are available, the amount of money spent by each county highways authority and highways authority on street lighting; and if he will state the percentage that money is of the total amount spent on roads, authority by authority.

Mr. Robert Atkins [pursuant to the reply, 18 July 1989, c. 88]: The following table was omitted.

Notes:

1. The figures shown for Greater London for the years 1983-84 to 1985-86 refer to spending on principal roads for which the Greater London Council were responsible. At that time London Boroughs were only responsible for non-principal roads. Following abolition of the GLC the London Boroughs took over the responsibility for principal roads.

2. Up to and including 1985-86 the Metropolitan Counties were responsible for local roads. From 1986-87 this responsibility passed to the Metropolitan Districts upon abolition of the Metropolitan Counties. This is reflected in the table above.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Retired Judges

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Attorney-General what is the official retirement age for Court of Appeal judges, High Court judges, and circuit judges; how many retired judges in each category returned to sit in (a) 1987 and (b) 1988, as deputy judges or ad hoc deputy judges; on how many occasions these judges, on average, have sat as deputies or ad hoc deputies; and what is the rate of pay for such service.

The Attorney-General: Court of Appeal and High Court judges retire on the date of their 75th birthdays. Circuit judges retire at the end of the completed year of service in which they attain the age of 72 though their period of full-time service can be extended, with the Lord Chancellor's approval, until they reach 75. In 1987, 43 retired judges sat as deputy circuit judges for a total of 1,868·5 days, five sat as deputy High Court judges for a total of 197 days, and eight sat as deputy Court of Appeal judges for a total of 285 days. In 1988, 32 judges sat as deputy circuit judges for a total of 1,764·5 days, eight sat as deputy High Court judges for a total of 273 days, and seven sat as deputy Court of Appeal judges for a total of 285 days. Deputy Court of Appeal judges are paid £361 per day. Deputy High Court judges are paid £328 per day. Deputy circuit judges are paid £179 per day.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Recycling

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the answer of 27 July to the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire), Official Report, column 815, if he will specify the initiatives taken by his Department's business and environment unit to give more focus to recycling.

Mr. Forth: My Department's business and the environment unit, formed in June of this year, is developing a number of initiatives to encourage increasing recycling of industrial residues and household waste. These include presentations to and sponsorship of a series of conferences, seminars and workshops; collaborating in the preparation of primary and secondary school education packs; participating in the "Recycling City" experiment; commissioning a range of recycling research and advisory work; and providing advice on recycling matters to trade associations, individual companies, local authorities, voluntary groups, and the general public. An advisory group, consisting of representatives of a wide range of interests in recycling, has also been established under the unit's chairmanship. It has met once so far.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what initiatives he has taken towards the recovery of small-scale batteries for materials recycling; and what communications he has with the European Commission on the matter of battery recovery and recycling.

Mr. Forth: Battery recycling is an established industry in the United Kingdom, but is almost entirely concentrated upon the larger lead acid and nickel cadmium cells, and the smaller silver oxide and mercury button cells. As part of a collaborative project, Waren Spring laboratory is carrying out research into methods of recovering small consumer batteries from the domestic waste stream. In December 1988, the European Commission presented a proposal for a directive covering batteries and accumulators containing dangerous substances. Negotiations on the proposal have yet to begin but, if adopted, the directive would have implications for battery recovery and recycling in member states.

EC Conference

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department is participating in the international conference on cost, planning and strategic issues for industry, environmental regulation in the European Community, on 19 and 20 October.

Mr. Forth: My Department was not invited to participate in this conference. But DTI representatives will be participating in a number of similar conferences in the next few weeks aimed at raising the level of environmental awareness in business.

CFCs

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if during the meeting of the Council of EEC Industry Ministers in Brussels on 26 September, he raised the issue of environmental protection and implications of European industrial policy for the environment; and if any initiatives were taken on the industrial dismantlement of chlorofluorocarbons from refrigerators.

Mr. Forth: No. However, there is close liaison between my Department and the Department of the Environment to ensure that the implications for the environment of measures affecting business and enterprise are fully taken into account in discussions between EC Ministers on all appropriate occasions. My Department has also commissioned a major study into the options for recovering, recycling and destroying chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) in the United Kingdom. The study, which will consider, among other things, the recovery of CFCs from industrial and domestic refrigerators, is due to be completed early next year.

WALES

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each year since 1981 the applications received by his Department from the Nature Conservancy Council for orders under section 29 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, showing those which resulted in such an order.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

Year	Site	Result of Application
1984	Tan-y-Gadair, Cadair Idris, Gwynedd	Order made
1984	Llyn Mawr, Powys	Order made
1985	Coedydd a Chorsydd, Aberteifi, Dyfed	Order made
1986	Rallt, Cors Erddreiniog, Gwynedd	Order made
1986	Clegir Mawr, Y Werthyr, Gwynedd	Application refused
1987	Llandegla Moor, Clwyd	Application refused

CIVIL SERVICE

Civil Servants (Promotion)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if he will make it his policy that promotion to senior grades in the civil service will be contingent upon working outwith the south-east area of England for a reasonable period during the course of the officers' careers.

Mr. Luce: No. Promotion to all grades in the Civil Service is on merit. This takes account of experience and other relevant factors. Senior staff are mobile grades and can be obliged to work in any location.

THE ARTS

Funding (Glasgow)

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he is allocating any additional funds to the city of Glasgow to use during its year as European city of culture.

Mr. Luce: I announced in Glasgow on 18 October last year that I had decided to show my appreciation of that city's efforts in preparing for its year as European city of culture 1990 by a special Government contribution of £0·5 million, spread over two years.

Museums Year

Mr. Cran: To ask the Minister for the Arts what steps his Department has taken to ensure the effective promotion of 1989 as Museums Year.

Mr. Luce: Museums Year is the initiative of the Museums Association in its centenary year. I strongly support this celebration of our museums and was pleased to join the Museums Association at its centenary conference held in York in September. I am delighted that, in the course of this year, my Department, the Museums and Galleries Commission, and the Museums Association, are working together on a number of initiatives including the creation and development of the Museums Training Institute.

Museums and Galleries (Maintenance)

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Minister for the Arts how much money is being provided in the current year for the repair and maintenance of museums and galleries; and how much was provided five and 10 years ago.

Mr. Luce: This year's provision for building and maintenance at the 11 national museums and galleries which I sponsor is £48 million. In 1979-80 the provision was £14 million and in 1984-85 it was £28 million.

North West Arts

Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last met the chairman of North West Arts to discuss the level of arts funding in the north-west.

Mr. Luce: I have not met the chairman of North West Arts to discuss funding.

Arts Council

Mr. Banks: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last met the chairman of the Arts Council to discuss the funding of the council.

Mr. Luce: I meet the chairman of the Arts Council on a regular basis to discuss matters of mutual interest. The last meeting was on 10 October.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Carl Bridgewater (Murder Inquiry)

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands asking him to name the two officers who were involved in the Carl Bridgewater murder inquiry who have been disciplined in the last five years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No.

Lorrain Osman

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the basis of whichwarrant issued in Hong Kong in 1985 the request for the extradition of Lorrain Osman under the Fugitive Offenders Act proceeded; and whether that warrant was exhibited to him or to Bow Street magistrates in pursuance of the authority to proceed or the issue of the provisional arrest warrant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The matters referred to are the subject of judicial review proceedings which opened in the divisional court on 4 October 1989.

Genocide

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how may (a) males and (b) females have been (i) charged and (ii) found guilty of an offence under section 1 of the Genocide Act 1969 in each year since 1969.

Mr. John Patten: No persons have been prosecuted under the Genocide Act 1969.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to review the Genocide Act 1969; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans to do so.

Cruelty to Animals

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) males and (b) females were (i) charged and (ii) convicted of cruelty to animals in 1987 and 1988 and to date in 1989.

Mr. John Patten: For information relating to 1987, I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to his question on 26 October 1988 at columns 266-68. Information for 1988 and 1989 is not yet available.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he has any plans to review the Protection Against Cruel Tethering Act 1988; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received concerning the implementation of the Protection Against Cruel Tethering Act 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have received no representations about the implementation of the Act since it came into force, and my right hon. Friend has at present no plans to review it.

Armed Robbery

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were (a) charged and (b) convicted of armed robbery in 1987 and 1988.

Mr. John Patten: There is no specific category of armed robbery. However on the information available centrally, it is estimated that in 1987 there were 470 persons found guilty of robbery where a firearms offence was involved. Similar estimates for prosecutions are not possible. Information for 1988 is not yet available.

Parental Responsibility

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received (a) supporting and (b) opposing legislation to require parents to be responsible for the actions of their children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Since March this year we have received 111 letters in favour of strengthening the legal responsibilities of parents for their children's behaviour and 13 against. In the light of the comments we have received, we are considering what changes to propose.

Devon Emergency Volunteers

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will visit the Devon emergency volunteers to convey his congratulations on their contribution to civil defence during the past 21 years.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to visit the Devon emergency volunteers, but we recognise and welcome most warmly the valuable contribution which they, and other volunteers, make to their local communities.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time taken by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board to resolve cases submitted to it; if there are any plans to reduce the period between the submission of a claim and payment of compensation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Information in this form is not available, but the percentage of cases resolved by the board within certain periods of registration is shown in paragraph 6 of its latest annual report (Cm 536), a copy of which is in the Library.

To speed up the processing of claims, the board's staff complement has been increased from 220 in 1987 to 320 now. A new office opened in Glasgow, which houses two thirds of the board's staff, and is now fully operational.

The board is reviewing its administrative procedures with the aim of reducing the time taken to resolve applications.

Police Manpower

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what requests he has received for increases in the manpower of the Dyfed-Powys police in each year since 1974.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information is as follows:

Years in which applications made	Posts applied for
1975-76	50
1986-87	1

Each of these applications was approved in full.

Condoms (Prisons)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he now has any plans to introduce a scheme whereby condoms would be made available to inmates in prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no such plan.

Soliciting

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to provide that the possession of condoms cannot be used as evidence in the prosecution of women for soliciting; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: It is for the courts to decide what constitutes relevant and admissible evidence in any particular case.

Life Prisoners

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many discretionary life sentence prisoners have been given knockbacks by the parole board beyond their judicial tariff.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information is not maintained in the form requested, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many discretionary life sentence prisoners have been released by the tariff date set by the judiciary.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None of the discretionary life sentence prisoners whose tariffs have been set on the advice of the judiciary following the Handscomb judgment in March 1987 has yet been released.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many discretionary life sentence prisoners have been considered by parole boards since the Handscomb judgment.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Since the divisional court judgment in the Handscomb case on 2 March 1987, the Parole Board has considered 368 cases of discretionary life sentence prisoners.

Re-unite

Sir George Young: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will respond to the application for funding from Re-unite made on 9 March.

Mr. John Patten: A response to their funding application has now been sent to Re-unite, making a formal grant offer. I have written to my hon. Friend.

"Let's Crack Crime"

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many copies of his Department's booklet "Let's Crack Crime" have been distributed.

Mr. John Patten: Nearly 2·5 million copies of the first and second editions of the Home Office crime prevention handbook "Practical Ways to Crack Crime" have been distributed in England and Wales. The third edition will be published shortly.

Gloucestershire (Burglaries)

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will report on the most recent figures for burglary in Gloucestershire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: In the 12-month period ended 30 June 1989, notifiable offences of burglary in Gloucestershire decreased by almost 15 per cent. compared with the previous 12 months. This information is published in table 7 of Home Office statistical bulletin 7/89 and in a subsequent table; copies of both are in the Library.

Concessionary Television Licences

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the representations he has received regarding the further restrictions on the availability of the concessionary television licence fee for pensioners.

Mr. Renton: Since the changes in the regulations in May 1988, we have received visits from four hon. Members[1], and 311 letters, 168 of them from hon. Members, about aspects of the concessionary TV licensing system. The nature of each is not separately recorded, but the main points raised were whether the scheme should be extended to ordinary housing, the treatment of new residents of schemes which no longer qualified and whether the circumstances of individual housing schemes fitted the new regulations.

[1]The figure of five hon. Members given in the answer of 3 July 1989 at column 19 to the question from the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was unfortunately incorrect, and I am writing to the hon. Member.

Turkish Kurds

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Turkish Kurds have been granted asylum in 1989.

Mr. Renton: We do not keep separate statistics of the ethnic origins of asylum seekers but the great majority of the Turkish nationals who have sought asylum here are of Kurdish origin. Seventy-one Turkish nationals have been granted refugee status so far in 1989, and a further 243 have been granted exceptional leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom. Decisions have yet to be reached on the majority of the 3,500 applications for asylum made by Turkish nationals who arrived in May and June.

Prison Population

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to reduce the number of convicted persons held in prison where the crime for which they were sentenced did not involve violence or illegal entry.

Mr. John Patten: We are developing further the ideas for encouraging greater use of community penalties in the Green Paper "Punishment Custody and the Community" (Cm 424). We have already taken steps to reduce the number of young adults in custody. We have issued national standards for community service orders. By ensuring that community service is rigorous and demanding, we hope to encourage its use for offenders who might otherwise receive a custodial sentence.

Broadcasting

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library the summary of the 3,000 responses he received to the White paper, "Broadcasting in the '90s Competition, Choice and Quality", with particular reference to responses to paragraph 6.17, the allocation of television franchises through the highest tender method.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend placed in the Library on 21 April a list of the main organisations which submitted comments on the broadcasting White Paper which he announced in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) at column 342. I regret that the further information sought would involve a fresh analysis of more than 3,000 submissions and could therefore be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Conservative Conference

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what additional resources were made available for policing and security at the 1989 Conservative conference at Blackpool.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The additional costs of policing the Conservative party conference at Blackpool will be met by the Lancashire police authority. Under the normal police funding arrangements, the Government contribute both directly through police grant—which is at 51 per cent.—and indirectly through block grant.

I understand from the chief constable of Lancashire that the additional costs including related security measures, are estimated to be £1·08 million.

The Conservative party, like other political parties, also incurs costs on specific security measures at its conference.

Immigration Enforcement

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were removed from the United Kingdom in 1988 as a result of immigration enforcement powers; and what was the figure five years ago.

Mr. Renton: In 1988, a total of 3,046 persons were removed from the United Kingdom under the enforcement powers in the Immigration Act 1971, either as illegal entrants or under the deportation process. The corresponding figure for 1983 was 1,196. More detailed information is published in tables 23 and 24 of the Home Office Command Paper "Control of Immigration: Statistics United Kingdom 1988" (Cm. 726), a copy of which is in the Library.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there are plans to link the vehicle and name indices of the police national computer so that the name extracted from the vehicle index could automatically search the names index; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There are no present plans for such a project.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the trend in the use of the names indices of the police national computer; what are the reasons for the changes in frequency of use; and what steps his Department takes to ensure that each access to the names index is for a bona fide police purpose.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of accesses to the names indices of the police national computer increased by 13·87 per cent. between 1986 and 1987 and by 12·23 per cent. between 1987 and 1988.

The reasons for individual inquiries are not monitored centrally. This is a matter for chief officers of police, who are also responsible for ensuring that inquiries are made only for appropriate police purposes.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will describe the purpose of the extremists crime index of the police national computer; if he will define the circumstances when information is added to the index; and if he will list the items of data held within the index.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The purpose of the index is to assist the police in the detection of crimes which might have a political, religious, social or environmental motive. It can be updated only by the Metropolitan police and accessed by a limited number of terminals in regional crime intelligence offices. The index contains the following data items:

Crime description
Date and time of crime

Modus operandi
Property value and description (if applicable)
Suspect details (if applicable)
Vehicle registration mark, value and description (if applicable)
Forensic and pathology data (if applicable)

Asylum Seekers (Turkey)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest available figures for asylum seekers from Turkey who have arrived since 18 January who have (a) been returned to Turkey, (b) interviewed but held in detention, (c) given temporary asylum for up to one year, (d) given leave to remain for more than one year and (e) granted refugee status.

Mr. Renton: The information is not available in the form requested. From the beginning of January up until the introduction of a visa requirement for Turkish nationals on 23 June some 3,900 Turkish nationals claimed asylum on arrival in the United Kingdom. As at 11 October, 34 have been refused asylum and returned to Turkey. On 11 October, nine remained in detention, all of whom had been interviewed. There is no status of temporary asylum, but temporary admission pending consideration of their claims was granted to all those who were not detained. Exceptional leave to remain, initially for 12 months, has been granted in 243 cases. A total of 71 have been recognised as refugees under the terms of the 1951 United Nations convention on refugees and granted four years leave to remain initially. A total of 229 have returned voluntarily to Turkey before examination of their cases was completed.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from non-statutory organisations concerning their call for resources to assist Kurdish asylum seekers; what response he has given; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Representations have been received from a number of Church, community and voluntary organisations seeking among other things financial assistance for emergency reception arrangements for Turkish asylum seekers who arrived in the United Kingdom in May and June. Exceptional payments to reimburse some of the expenses incurred have been made to most non-statutory organisations which assisted; a few others remain under consideration and will be settled shortly.

Parking Enforcement

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has yet considered the conclusions of the parking enforcement working party; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope) on 27 July 1989 at column 799.

Edinburgh International Television Festival

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representatives of his Department attended sessions of the Edinburgh international television festival.

Mr. Renton: One.

Acid House Party, Rickmansworth

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable of Hertfordshire on the policing of an acid house party at Stochers Farm, Rickmansworth on 2 September and of the number of persons arrested and charged with an offence and the number of police officers deployed; and what policy guidance he is giving on the policing of such events with a view to maintaining the peace in the interests of local residents in the areas in which such parties take place.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief constable of Hertfordshire that a total of 36 people were arrested in connection with the event, one of whom was subsequently charged. The number of police officers deployed was 120. We welcome the vigorous action which the police have taken to deal with events of this kind. My right hon. Friend will shortly be discussing with chief officers of police the policing of these parties and the problems to which they have given rise.

Roskill Inquiry

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans there are to implement the recommendation of the Roskill inquiry that fraud cases should no longer be tried before a jury.

Mr. John Patten: We want to give the reforms introduced by the Criminal Justice Acts 1987 and 1988, which were designed to make the jury's task easier, a chance to prove their worth before we consider the recommendation further.

Immigration

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were detained under Immigration Act powers for a period of more than two months on completion of a custodial sentence during 1988.

Mr. Renton [holding answer 28 July 1989]: Eleven.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for (a) single entry and (b) multiple entry visit visas were (1) received, (2) granted and (3) refused at each post in the Indian sub-continent, Ghana, Nigeria and Jamaica in each quarter of 1988 and the first quarter of 1989; and what was the delay between application and interview for those whose applications were felt to need a second or long interview at each of the above posts in (i) June 1988, (ii) January 1989 and (iii) June 1989 or the nearest available date.

Mr. Renton [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1054]: Information on applications in Jamaica for a visit entry clearance, and separate information on applications in the other countries for single entry and multiple entry visas, are not available centrally. The other information requested is given in the tables.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for entry clearance in order to seek asylum in the United Kingdom were (a) received and (b) granted by country during 1988 and the first quarter of 1989.

Mr. Renton [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1054]: Information on applications for refugee status in the United Kingdom made abroad is given in the following table:

[1] In addition some applications for refugee status in the United Kingdom, made in India by nationals of Afghanistan, were processed locally by the British High Commission in New Delhi. 1,725 such applications were received in 1988 and 5 in the first quarter of 1989. No grants of refugee status were made during this time; 1,200 applications were awaiting a decision at the end of March 1989.
[2] Figures rounded to the nearest 5, with '•' = 1 or 2.
[3] Grants in the time periods shown do not necessarily relate to applications made in those periods.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many outstanding immigration applications there are at Lunar house; what time savings in dealing with applications from (a) students, (b) family members in the United Kingdom applying for variation of stay, (c) settlement entry clearance applications referred from overseas posts and (d) asylum-seekers have been achieved by recent changes in procedures and practice; and what are the average times applicants in each category might expect to wait before a decision.

Mr. Renton [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1055]: At the end of June 1989, there were 34,800 cases outstanding in the immigration caseworking groups and 9,600 active cases in the refugee and special cases unit.

A number of changes in procedure and practice have been introduced recently with the aim of reducing the level of outstanding applications and reducing the time taken to process them. Information on the effects of these changes is not available in the form requested.

The estimated average length of time between the receipt of an application and the decision, for cases decided in caseworking groups and the public inquiry offices, in the second quarter of 1989 was 4·5 months for students and 13·5 months for applicants for refugee status. Information on average waiting times for family members in the United Kingdom for variation of leave and for settlement entry clearance applications referred from overseas posts is not available.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for entry clearance from (a) wives, (b) husbands, (c) fiancés, and (d) fiancées made at British posts in (1) New Delhi, (2) Bombay, (3) Calcutta, (4) Madras, (5) Dhaka, (6) Islamabad, (7) Karachi, and (8) Colombo for each quarter since January 1988 to the nearest available date were (a) received, (b) granted and (c) refused; how many refusals at each post were (i) wholly and (ii) partly because the visa officer was not satisfied that the primary purpose of the marriage was not immigration; how many refusals at each post were (i) wholly and (ii) partly because the visa officer was not satisfied that the couple could support and accommodate themselves without recourse to public funds; what was the refusal rate at each post and what percentage of those refusals were (x) wholly and (y) partly on primary purpose grounds.

Mr. Renton [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989 c. 1059]: Information for the Indian sub-continent for the whole of 1988 and, where available, for the fourth quarter of 1988 and first quarter of 1989 is given in the tables. For information for the first three quarters of 1988, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 20 December 1988 at columns 179-82. Where the numbers are small, the figures for individual posts have been combined. Information on refusals which takes account of successful appeals is not compiled for periods shorter than 12 months. Corresponding information for Colombo is not available centrally.

Immigration

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were waiting for special quota vouchers in (i) India and (ii) East Africa in (a) May 1988 and (b) December 1988; when those issued with vouchers on those dates had applied; how many vouchers were issued in (i) India and (ii) East Africa in (a) 1988 and (b) the first quarter of 1989; when those applying can now expect to receive vouchers; and how many applicants there were for vouchers in (i) India and (ii) East Africa in (a) 1988 and (b) the first half of 1989.

Mr. Renton [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1063]: The information which is currently available is given in the tables:

HEALTH

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funding was made available for the running of family practitioner committees in 1988-89; and what sum has been agreed for 1989-90.

Mr. Freeman: The funding made available for the running of family practitioner committees for these two financial years is as follows:

	Revenue £	Capital £
1988-89	55,735,000	3,278,000
1989-90	64,417,000	5,505,000

Prescribing Budgets

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library PACT data aggregated at family practitioner level.

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans to do so. We are, however, considering what statistical information to make available to the House routinely in connection with the indicative prescribing budget scheme.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultations he has held, and what action he proposes, relating to his implementation of section 8 of working paper No. 4 concerning budgets for prescribing by general practitioners.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I continue to invite discussions with all interested parties on the operation of indicative drug budgets for general practitioners and I issued working paper No. 4 in order to stimulate such discussions. I held a useful discussion with representatives of the British Medical Association on 27 September at which I repeated and they accepted by assurance that the arrangements for managing the indicative prescribing budget scheme will not infringe in any way the right of a general practitioner to prescribe all those medicines which individual patients might need.

As I announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) on 24 July at column 540, a new prescribing budgets information system to implement prescribing budgets is being developed at the Prescription Pricing Authority. The system will be piloted in November 1990.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what current instructions he has given to family practitioner committees in respect of abnormal volumes or cost of prescribing by any of its contractor general practitioners; and in how many cases in 1988 any such matter was drawn to the attention of the relevant local medical committee.

Mr. Mellor: No guidance has yet been issued to family practitioner committees on this issue, as they do not assume the responsibility of monitoring prescribing by individual general medical practitioners until April 1990. It is not current practice to refer cases of over-prescribing to local medical committees. A new procedure for handling such cases at FPC level will be introduced as part of the implementation of the NHS review.

Registered Nurses (Mental Health)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what arrangements have been made to protect the pay, conditions, training opportunities, career prospects, continuity of service and pension rights in the short, medium and long term of those staff possessing the registered nurse mental health qualification who transfer from health authority to local authority employment as a result of implementation of Government proposals concerning care in the community; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what proposals he is considering concerning the standardisation of the registered nurse mental health qualifications held by employees of health authorities and the certificate of social services held by employees of local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Our detailed proposals for the future organisation and funding of community care will be published in the forthcoming White Paper. The issues we are considering include the implications for staff who transfer from health authority to local authority employment. A number of certificate in social services schemes now contain an element of joint training leading to the award of both the certificate in social services and entry to part V of the UKCC Register of nurses trained in the nursing of persons suffering from mental handicap. The proposed introduction of the diploma in social work, which will replace both the certificate in social services and the certificate of qualification in social work is expected to increase further the opportunities for joint training.

Self-Governing Unit

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what will be his Department's expenditure on its self-governing unit in the present financial year.

Mr. Freeman: The self-governing hospitals unit is part of the Department of Health's regional liaison division. The budget for the unit for the financial year 1989-90 is about £210,000 for staff and travel and subsistence.

Convalescent Care

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to introduce national guidelines on the provision of convalescent care.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Dental Auxiliaries

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the current claim before committee H of the Whitley council on the pay of dental auxiliary staff.

Mr. Mellor: The staff side of committee H of the Professional and Technical Staffs B Whitley Council has accepted an increase of 6·5 per cent. for dental auxiliaries effective from 1 July 1989.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the change in pay in real terms of a senior dental surgery assistant aged 21 in every year since 1980, expressing the pay level for 1980 as 100.

Mr. Mellor: Information is not available in precisely the form requested. The available information is given in the table which shows both the minimum and the maximum paypoints of the relevant basic pay scale for each year, deflated by the RPI, and expressed as an index with 1980 as 100. Information on total earnings is not available centrally.

Senior Dental Surgery Assistant

1985	92	92
1986	95	95
1987	96	95
1988	96	96
1989	95	94

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his latest estimate of annual turnover of dental auxiliaries in the hospital service and the community dental service.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold this information centrally.

Calibre Cassette Library

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will restore the Government grant to the Calibre cassette library for the blind and handicapped.

Mr. Freeman: Calibre received funding under our section 64 scheme of grants from 1976 until 1984 when a three-year tapering grant ended. We have since received no further application for funding.

Any new application for funding from Calibre will receive careful consideration. However, as their activity relates to the provision of a library, rather than a health or social service, it is very unlikely that their application would meet our criteria for grants under the section 64 scheme.

Autistic Children (Avon)

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the numbers of autistic children in Avon aged between two and 16 years.

Mr. Freeman: Information on which such an estimate could be based is not held centrally or routinely collected locally.

Regional and District Health Authorities

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state the numbers of members of regional and district health authorities in England and Wales who are currently (a) directly appointed by him, (b) appointed by his appointees and (c) appointed by elected statutory bodies; and what will be the comparable numbers for regional and district health authorities and new bodies after implementation of his current proposals.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend is presently responsible for the appointment of 234 members of regional health authorities in England. The majority of members of English district health authorities, 2,348, are appointed by regional health authorities with a smaller number, 862, appointed by local authorities.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary legislation, my right hon. and learned Friend will appoint the five non-executive members of each RHA and up to three non-executive directors of each NHS hospital trust. The relevant RHA will appoint the five non-executive members of each DHA and at least two non-executive directors of each NHS hospital trust.

Each RHA and DHA will have up to five executive members. Of these, the general manager will be appointed by the chairman and the non-executive members; and the remainder by the chairman and the non-executive members acting with the general manager. NHS hospital trusts will have up to five executive directors. Of these, the general manager will be appointed by the chairman and non-executive directors, and the remainder by the chairman and non-executive directors acting with the general manager.

The appointment of members of DHAs in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Rats

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action does he expect to take to combat rat infestations within the system of public sewers; and what action he requires of district health authorities to monitor rodent control within their respective areas.

Mr. Freeman: Local authorities are responsible under the Prevention of Damage by Pests Act 1949 for ensuring that their areas, including sewers, are kept as free as practicable from rats and mice. District health authorities are not required to monitor rodent control within their areas.

Accounting Staff

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his latest estimate of the total numbers of additional accounting staff which will be needed, and of what numbers will need specific qualifications, to operate his proposals for cost comparison within the National Health Service.

Mr. Mellor: It is a matter for health authorities themselves to determine their staffing needs and additional needs in relation to finance activities, including costing and contracting, following the National Health Service White Paper "Working for Patients".

The National Health Service management executive has made available £9·87 million in this financial year to strengthen the finance function in health authorities, units and hospitals in support of the White Paper proposals which require strong financial management—for example, developing contracts, capital charges and self-governing hospitals. In addition, £1·66 million is being spent this year on a training programme for finance staff targeted at the new skills needed. The National Health Service management executive will be discussing future finance staff resource needs with regions at the end of the year.

Lowermoor

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his proposals to set up an independent panel of scientists to consider water pollution-related incidents in the light of Dame Barbara Clayton's report on the Lowermoor incident.

Mr. Freeman: As I wrote to the hon. Member on 21 August, I will make an announcement at the earliest possible moment.

Blood Supplies

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps the National Blood Transfusion Service has taken to ensure that all blood supplied through the service is free of the HIV-2 virus, as well as the HIV-1 virus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Since August 1983 potential donors have been given a leaflet which asks those at risk of HIV infection not to give blood.

In addition, since June 1988 samples from donors who have visited those countries where HIV-2 is more common have been tested for antibodies to HIV-2. The need for testing on a wider basis is kept under constant review in the light of the test results and any new developments.

All blood donations have been tested for antibodies to HIV 1 since October 1985.

Autistic Children

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines he provides for the diagnosis and statementing of autistic children for pre-nursery entry.

Mr. Freeman: Recent guidance on the procedures involved in the assessment and statementing of children with special educational needs has just been issued jointly by my Department and the Department of Education and Science. This guidance covers children under five, including autistic children. Copies of the guidance have been placed in the Library. [DH circular HN (89) 20 and DES circular 22/89].

Bed Closures

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will tabulate the number of beds in hospitals of each regional health authority that have been closed in 1989 to a recent convenient date, and not yet reopened by virtue of shortage of funds; and what action he expects to take to ensure that they reopen in the remainder of 1989 or during 1990.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold information on temporary closures and the reasons for them. It is for health authorities to decide when such measures are necessary. Temporary closures may be made for a number of reasons other than financial ones, for example, for building repairs or redecoration.

District Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what calculations he has made concerning the approximate overall percentage of increased costs between the financial years 1988-89 and 1989-90 borne by district health authorities in respect of the commodities, services, and other costs, adjusted by weight of expenditure; if he will publish such calculations; and what changes in grant calculations he expects to make in respect of their costs for the financial year 1990-91.

Mr. Freeman: Price increases experienced by health authorities are measured using the Health Service prices index. Our estimate is that the rise in the index this year over 1988-89 will be about 5·7 per cent.

Health authority allocations for 1990-91 will be announced later this year after decisions on public expenditure for next year have been made.

Patients' Records

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to guarantee the confidentiality of patients' records stored in computers, in the light of the British Medical Association's report stating that doctors cannot guarantee their confidentiality.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 20 July 1989]: The British Medical Association has frequently pressed the view that the Data Protection Act 1984 whose provisions were implemented in November 1987 puts in jeopardy the confidentiality of patients' health information held on computers.

The Data Protection Act in fact underlines the need for confidentiality of personal information and reinforces the policy long followed in the NHS that patients' records are confidential and staff face disciplinary action in the event of such confidence being breached.

AIDS

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) under what powers he can limit foreign AIDS patients from coming to the United Kingdom for free treatment; and under what circumstances he uses those powers;

(2) whether he will investigate the prevalence amongst foreign AIDS patients of coming to the United Kingdom for treatment for (a) medical and (b) personal reasons, setting out those personal reasons.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 27 July 1989]: The National Health Service (Charges to Overseas Visitors)

Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1987 provide that an overseas visitor is exempt from charges for NHS hospital treatment for HIV infection only in relation to initial diagnostic testing and associated counselling. Such a visitor would have to pay charges in the usual way for any subsequent hospital treatment whether as an inpatient or an outpatient. Health authorities are required to make such charges in every case. The question of limiting entry to the United Kingdom is one for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Home Affairs.

We have no plans to investigate the reasons why AIDS patients come to this country for treatment and know of no reason to do so. We are satisfied that the present charging arrangements are a reasonable response to the situation.

Free Prescriptions

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of people entitled to free prescriptions at 31 March 1988, and what is the corresponding figure for the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 28 July 1989]: It is estimated that the number of people entitled to free prescriptions at 31 March 1988 was 23·7 million. The corresponding figure for 31 March 1989, the latest date for which information is available, is estimated to have been 23·6 million.

These figures show that despite some far-reaching changes in the social security system and certain changes in the arrangements for exemption from prescription charges that took effect in April 1988, they had little significant impact upon the total number of people entitled to free prescriptions.

General Practitioners

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners were under contract to the National Health Service in 1979; how much this cost; and what were the comparable figures in 1988.

75. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of general practitioners now; and what it was in 1979.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 25 July 1989, c. 669]: In my reply to you on 25 July I quoted figures for 1987 for the cost of general medical services as being £125 million.

This figure that was quoted was incorrect and should have been £1,250 million.

Blood

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the profit made by the Blood Transfusion Service on each 1,000 pints of donated blood bought by private sector health institutions; what method is used to determine the price at which blood will be sold to the private sector; how much blood was sold in total for each of the last 10 years to the private sector for all blood groups and the rarest blood groups; what was this as a percentage of total blood donations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman [pursuant to his reply, 10 July 1989, column 373]: Figures for units of blood issued to non-NHS hospitals which read 84,361 should have read 80,002.

The percentage for 1987 which read 4·2 should have read 4·0.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Swindon 2 Tax Office

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what basis an Inland Revenue official at Swindon 2 tax office communicated information on Suzanne Allen and Yvonne Knight to Swindon police.

Mr. Lilley: I refer the hon. Member to my answer on 28 July at column 1146.

Interest Rates

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received against his present policy on interest rate levels from organisations representing the self-employed; and what replies he has sent.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of letters from organisations representing the self-employed. The replies explain that everyone has far more to fear from inflation than from a period of higher interest rates.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has made any estimate of the additional savings available for investment by leading institutions made available by each 1 per cent. increase in base interest rate.

Mr. Ryder: No. Certainly, higher interest rates encourage saving and reduce lending. But it is by no means true that all United Kingdom savings go to lending institutions, nor that lending institutions obtain their funds solely from United Kingdom savers. More generally, mortgage and other credit rationing is not a feature of the present day financial system. Lenders are constrained by the demand for credit at prevailing interest rates. Interest rates represent the price of money and credit, and naturally their demand falls when the price is raised. The relationship is complex, but the direction and the significance of the effect are clear.

British-Irish Parliamentary Group

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what public funding has been agreed for the proposed British-Irish parliamentary group under the auspices of the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

Mr. Lawson: The British group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union will receive in 1989-90 a grant in aid of £1,575,000. This is substantially higher than the normal annual grant, as the Estimate included provision for the costs of the recent centenary conference which was hosted by the British group in London.

It is hoped that the cost in 1989-90 of creating the proposed British-Irish inter-parliamentary body can be met from sums available within this grant. Funding in future years is presently being discussed in the context of the public expenditure survey.

Incomes

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give his latest estimates of net disposable income for each region of the United Kingdom after taking account of mortgage repayments.

Mr. Lilley: The only available regional information on average per capita disposable income after taking account of mortgage repayments is from family expenditure surveys. Data for 1986 and 1987 combined are:

	£ per person per week
North	64·28
Yorkshire and Humberside	66·72
East Midlands	67·84
East Anglia	69·42
Greater London	96·78
Rest of the South East	85·68
South West	77·48
West Midlands	66·27
North West	71·27
Wales	60·60
Scotland	66·30
Northern Ireland	56·98
United Kingdom	74·16

Data from the Family Expenditure Survey are subject to sampling variations and, therefore, the results for two years have been combined in order to increase the accuracy. It should be noted that in accordance with FES definitions of disposable income the figures include imputed income from owner occupancy. Furthermore, mortgage repayments, but not payments of rent, have been deducted from the disposable income figures.

Civil Servants

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many civil servants there are at present; and what was the equivalent figure 10 years ago.

Mr. Lawson: At 1 July 1989, there were 567,073 staff in post in central Government Departments. This information was published by Her Majesty's Treasury in a press release on 18 September 1989 (No. 72/89). The comparable figure for 1 July 1979 is 723,747.

Overseas Assets

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will bring up to date the information provided in the reply dated 16 March 1983, Official Report, column 164, concerning the amount of tax collected on income earning and other assets held overseas; and if he will include in the table an estimate for each year of the total value of such assets, whether or not they have been assessed to tax.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1134]: Income tax charged on investment income received from overseas in the year ending 5 April 1987 and taxed under cases IV and V of schedule D is estimated to be in the region of £80 million before allowing for double taxation relief. The amount of such relief could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Income tax deducted from foreign company and public revenue dividends paid by or through United Kingdom paying and collecting agents in the year ended 5 April 1989 amounted to £192 million.

These figures are, in each case, for the latest available year. Figures for earlier years are not covered by the reply of 16 March 1983 and could be provided only at a disproportionate cost. The value of the assets giving rise to these tax charges is not known.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the estimated number and direct revenue cost of wife's earnings elections in a full year by range of incomes at 1989-90 income and tax levels, together with tables for (i) husband and (ii) wives showing (a) the numbers separately assessed by range of total income of the relevant spouse and (b) the aggregate total income of each spouse and the aggregate investment income of each spouse; and if he will add a table showing the additional direct revenue cost on the basis of the 1990-91 proposals for the separate taxation of husbands and wives;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for wives with earned income on Inland Revenue records the estimated distribution of the number of such wives in 1989-90 by wife's total income and the couples' joint total income together with the estimated revenue loss from wife's earnings elections and the estimated further loss on the 1990-91 basis of separate taxation of husbands and wives.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his replies, 28 July 1989, c. 1119-21]: Available estimates at 1989-90 income levels are in the tables. They are based on a projection of the 1986-87 survey of personal incomes and are, therefore, provisional. The distribution of wives earned income for 1988-89 is also given, because previous estimates have been revised. Further estimates by range of investment income and under independent taxation in 1990-91 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for those above and those below age 65 years the estimated number of tax units and their tax liability in the current financial year in each range of total income up to a lower limit of £100,000 divided into single persons and one-earner and two-earner married couples together; and if he will include the number of females within each category and their tax liability;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report tables showing for those above and for those below pensionable age, the estimated number of tax units paying income tax and their income tax liability as a proportion of their total income in a full year at 1989-90 rates, by range of total income up to a lower limit of £100,000 distinguishing between single persons, one-earner and two-earner married couples, and if he will add figures showing what effect his proposals for the separate taxation of husbands and wives will have on the numbers of tax units and the proportion paid in tax by (a) one-earner and (b) two-earner married couples.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his replies, 28 July 1989, c. 1119-22]: Available estimates are given in the tables. All estimates are based on a projection of the 1986-87 survey of personal incomes and are provisional. Under the present system a married woman's income is treated as her husband's and taxed as if it belonged to him. Separate estimates for single women are provided in the tables.

Comparable estimates after the introduction of independent taxation of husbands and wives are not available. However, estimates of gains in 1990-91 were included in the Inland Revenue press release "Independent Taxation of Husbands and Wife", published on 15 March 1988.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report his estimate of the yield from an increase of one pence in the standard rate of tax and in the employees' and employers' national insurance contribution, respectively, in 1989-90; and if he will divide the tax figure to show the yield from earned and unearned incomes.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1122]: An increase of 1p in the basic rate of income tax is estimated to yield about £1·5 billion in a full year at 1989-90 income levels; 90 per cent. of the yield is estimated to be from tax on earned income.

An increase of 1 percentage point in standard class 1 national insurance contribution rates is estimated to yield employee contributions of £2 billion and employer contributions of £2·25 billion in a full year at 1989-90 income levels.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing his estimate of the number of cases in which higher rate relief will be given on mortgage interest payments in the current financial year together with (a) the gross amount of interest qualifying for relief, (b) the amount of higher relief and (c) the number of recipients of working age and their distribution by personal tax category and by range of total income together with the average amount of relief given at the standard and higher rate of tax; and if he will add his forecast of the additional cost to the Revenue on the basis of this year's figures and rates of tax of mortgage relief as a result of the separate taxation of married couples;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by range of income and tax status an estimate of the saving to the Exchequer in a full year from abolishing, respectively, the upper earnings limit for national insurance contributions and higher rate relief on mortgage interest.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his replies, 28 July 1989 c. 1122-36]: Provisional estimates of excess over basic rate relief on mortgage interest in 1989-90, based on a projection of the 1986-87 survey of personal incomes, are given in the table. Estimates for independent taxation are not available.

It is estimated that the full year yield, at 1989-90 levels, of the abolition of the upper earnings limit for employees' national insurance contributions would be £1·8 billion. Of the £1·8 billion, it is estimated that £0·3 billion would be from single persons, £0·8 billion from one-earner married couples and £0·7 billion from two-earner married couples. A more detailed breakdown of the yield is not available.

Estimates are consistent with those made at the time of the Budget and they exclude any behavioural effects of the proposed changes.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report tables showing by range of total income up to a lower limit of £100,000, for those above and those below pensionable age and distinguishing between single persons, one-earner and two-earner married couples, the estimated saving to the Exchequer of abolishing all allowances and reliefs other than the basic single and married allowances; and if he will provide similar tables on the 1990 basis of separate taxation of husbands and wives.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1121]: The total direct revenue yield from abolishing all income tax allowances (other than the basic single and married allowances) and reliefs cannot be estimated reliably.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the earned and unearned income of the top 1 per cent. of taxpayers in the current financial year and of the amount they are expected to pay in national insurance contributions.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1127]: I refer the hon. Member to my predecessor's reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) of 3 July, Official Report, columns 33-36 for estimates of the earned and investment income of the top 1 per cent. of income tax payers. They are provisionally estimated to pay about £300 million in national insurance contributions in 1989-90.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of tax units and amount of earned income in each tax band by range of total income and tax status for those (a) above and (b) below pensionable age.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1127]: Available estimates are given in the tables. They are based on a projection of the 1986-87 survey of personal incomes and are provisional. Earned income includes any state or occupational pensions received.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of tax units in each tax band by range of total income and tax status for those below pensionable age, his estimate of the cost to the Revenue of the substitution of a single allowance of £3,000 and a married allowance of £6,000 for the present personal income tax allowances, the married women's earnings allowance and the wife's earnings election together with an increase in the rate of income tax from 25 per cent. to 35 per cent. on total incomes between £5,500 and £13,000 for single persons and £11,000 and £18,500 for married persons.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1127]: Estimates of the direct change in income tax liability are given in the tables. They assume the following allowance and rate structure:

(i) single person's allowance of £3,000;
(ii) married man's allowance of £6,000;
(iii) abolition of wife's earned income allowance and wife's earnings election;
(iv) a basic rate tax of 25 per cent. on taxable income between
£1 and £5,500 for single persons
£1 and £11,000 for married couples
(v) a higher rate tax of 35 per cent. on taxable income between
£5,501 and £13,000 for single persons
£11,001 and £18,500 for married couples
(vi) a higher rate tax of 40 per cent. on taxable income above
£13,000 for single persons
£18,500 for married couples

No allowance is made for possible behavioural effects or the consequential effects on capital gains tax. All estimates are based on a projection of the 1986-87 survey of personal incomes and are provisional. Further information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of tax units in each tax band by range of total income and tax status for those (a) above and (b) below pensionable age and his estimate of the yield from making investment income chargeable to national insurance contributions on the same basis as earned income; and if he will include the number of tax units and total investment income in each case.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1127-28]: The hon. Member's question provides insufficient information on which to base an answer.

Mortgages

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1979 the increase in mortgage funds for housing together with the increase in the value of the houses sold by reference to stamp duty or otherwise.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1134]: Information on loans for house purchase is published in table 9.4 of "Financial Statistics". Information for earlier years appears on the Central Statistical Office databank which is available in the House of Commons Library. The table shows the year-on-year increase in the total value of residential property sold since 1979.

Pensions

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report (i) his estimate of the employers' notional contribution to notionally funded and unfunded schemes, (ii) figures for the Civil Service showing the percentage contribution made by the Government and their employees and (iii) his best estimate of the proportional split between sources of pension income in the cases quoted in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of paragraph 22 of the Inland Revenue paper, using as a basis the information given in his answer of 11 November 1988, Official Report, column 235.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 1136]: Available information is as follows:

(i) Employers' notional contributions to notionally funded and unfunded pension schemes are published in table 4.10 of the 1989 edition of the "United Kingdom National Accounts".

(ii) The Civil Service pension scheme is not funded. The costs of benefits are met as they arise from the civil superannuation vote. The Government Actuary's Department has costed employers' contributions at 17 per cent. of salaries. Employees pay contributions at 1½ per cent. of salary, mainly for widowers-widows benefits.

(iii) Sources of income are published in the table referred to at (i). The full analysis requested would involve disproportionate cost.

Stamp Duty

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will provide an up-to-date estimate of the yield of stamp duty on the sale of domestic premises in the current financial year and in 1988-89, with a breakdown by regions where possible.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 28 July 1989, c. 851]: The table gives the estimated yield from stamp duty on residential property in 1988-89, broken down by regions. Estimates for Scotland and Northern Ireland are very tentative since the information available does not distinguish receipts from conveyances of residential property in these regions.

Region	£ million
North	15

South East	375
South West	130

The forecast of stamp duty receipts in 1989-90, which was published in the 1989-90 "Financial Statement and Budget Report", included a forecast of £1,000 million for stamp duty on residential property. A regional breakdown of this figure is not available.

Pension Fund Holidays

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report the value in 1988 and the current year to date of pension fund contribution holidays taken by employers and employees, respectively, together with his estimate of the amount of tax due thereon.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to his reply, 27 July 1989, c. 853]: Information is not readily available in the form requested. The table gives information on large self-administered pension funds reporting to the Inland Revenue on proposed action to remove surpluses following the legislation in the Finance Act 1986.

EMPLOYMENT

Civil Service (Relocation)

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress is being made in his Department's review, in line with Treasury guidelines, of the potential for the further relocation of Civil Service posts outside London and the south-east; and when he expects the review to be completed.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given on 7 June 1989 at column 57 to the hon. Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler).

YTS

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, how many YTS starts and how many leavers were recorded by each payment type, by male and female, and by one or two year training entitlement by standard training agency region, for Great Britain as a whole, and for each of the last three months.

Mr. Nicholls: As the information is contained in several tables I shall send the hon. Member the information requested and place a copy in the Library.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current number of unemployed and unemployment rate in the United Kingdom and the latest figure in other EEC countries on the basis used by the EEC Commission for comparative purposes; and what information he has for the United Kingdom and other EEC countries on the corresponding figures for June 1985, June 1979 and June 1973.

Mr. Eggar: The available information is given in the following table. International unemployment rates on a comparable basis are not available for June 1985, June 1979 and June 1973.

Employment Training

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he will reply to Mr. Paul Handisside's letter of complaint about his experience on employment training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: A reply was sent on 24 July 1989.

Inflation and Unemployment

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by how much (a) inflation and (b) unemployment have increased at the latest available date since 1979 in (i) each EEC country, (ii) the United States of America, (iii) Japan, (iv) Sweden, (v) the EEC as a whole and (vi) the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development as a whole.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if, pursuant to the reply to the honourable Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) Official Report, 21 July, column 390, he will list that research work, known to his Department, which does not support the view that the removal of statutory minimum wage provisions can be expected to have beneficial effects on employment.

Mr. Nicholls: There are two such studies:
C. Craig, F. Wilkinson, G. Rubery and R. Tarling "Labour Market Structure, Industrial Organisation and Low Pay" Department of Applied Economics, Cambridge Research Paper No 54, 1982.
D. Canning and R. Tarling, "A Report on the Department of Employment's Study, Wages Floors in the Clothing Industry 1950-1981, Department of Applied Economics, Cambridge, 1985.
My Department does not necessarily agree that the evidence presented in these studies supports the conclusions drawn. In the latter case, a rebuttal of the authors' findings was published at the time.

Training Schemes

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will ensure that all those employed on training schemes whether under youth training or employment training arrangements are fully covered by the health and safety regulations appropriate to the industry or business in which they are involved.

Mr. Nicholls: YTS and ET trainees are afforded the same protection as employees under the Health and Safety at Work Act 1974 by virtue of the Health and Safety (Training for Employment) Regulations 1988 (as amended).

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will ensure that all those placed in employment training and YTS are fully inducted in safe working practices, that they are properly insured and provided with safety equipment, clothing and footwear appropriate to the activities in which they are engaged.

Mr. Nicholls: Comprehensive statutory and contractual arrangements exist to ensure the health, safety and welfare of all ET and YTS trainees. These arrangements include provision for proper induction, insurance and appropriate protective equipment and clothing.

Interest Rates

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has made any assessment of the effects on employment of the current level of interest rates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The Government will continue to keep interest rates at whatever level is necessary to reduce inflation. This Department does not make forecasts of the future levels of employment or unemployment but if excessive wage increases are conceded jobs will be lost.

Small Businesses (Loans)

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to provide smaller business with lower-cost, fixed-term loans.

Mr. Eggar: There are no plans to introduce a system which would provide subsidised loans for small businesses. This would distort competition and discriminate against businesses which have to obtain finance from normal commercial sources.

Benefit Claimants

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons in the west midlands region were disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit during the period 1 January to 31 March 1989 because they were considered to have left their employment voluntarily without just cause and subsequently appealed against the disqualification.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 27 July 1989]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 28 July 1989 at column 1050.

The number of persons who appeal against the decision to disqualify unemployment benefit because they were considered to have left their employment voluntarily without just cause are not separately identified from other claimants who appeal against the decision of an adjudication officer.

DEFENCE

Kurt Waldheim

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will publish the results of the review of the 1986 investigation into the fate of captive British service men and the possible involvement of the then Lieutenant Waldheim.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced on 16 February 1988 that a review would be undertaken of the results of the investigation carried out in 1986 by the Ministry of Defence into the fate of British servicemen and the possible involvement of the then Lieutenant Waldheim. This was in the light of both the report of the Commission set up by the Austrian Government, which had access to a wider range of sources than those available for the 1986 investigation, and of the continued questioning of Lieutenant Waldheim's role. Her Majesty's Government have now conducted most thorough inquiries into the allegations concerning his role in areas of specific British interest. The results of this review have been recorded in a report, which I have placed today in the Library of the House, and which is being published by HMSO.

The review has been solely concerned with areas of British interest and has centred on the cases of British service men, mostly members of the special forces, captured between October 1943 and October 1944 in Greece and the Greek islands under the control of the German Army Group E, in whose headquarters Lieutenant Waldheim was then serving as a junior staff officer. These cases, covering over 80 British service men, include both those brought to the attention of the Ministry of Defence and others identified during the research for this review. The review has not looked at other allegations concerning Lieutenant Waldheim's involvement in areas not related to British interests.

The review has involved long and painstaking research. The historical evidence and the documents gathered have been examined and analysed by the director of Army legal services who is well versed in the laws of war and who retains a residual responsibility for the prosecution of war crimes. His duty is to examine the evidence that has been put before him and advise whether, on that evidence, there is a case for a potential accused to answer. After very careful consideration his conclusion concerning the then Lieutenant Waldheim is that there is no evidence from which guilt of a war crime might be inferred.

The report indicates that Lieutenant Waldheim knew of the capture of the British service men and the possible fate of "Commandos", but no evidence has come to light to indicate that as a junior staff officer he had the power either to order or to prevent that fate or indeed to affect the outcome in any way. Knowledge in such circumstances is not itself a crime. Her Majesty's Government have accepted the findings of the report.

The report also deals with British knowledge of Lieutenant Waldheim's wartime role and the post-war handling of relevant records. Allegations that records were altered, destroyed or withheld to protect President Waldheim are shown to be unfounded. He was not wanted by the United Kingdom either as a "top Nazi" or as a war criminal. In order to clarify these issues virtually all the most relevant papers have been included as annexes to the report. A very few documents have either not been published or not in full, on the ground of security or personal sensitivity. All these documents have been examined by Professor Sir Harry Hinsley, lately the Master of St. John's college, Cambridge, who agreed to scrutinise the results of the review in order to ensure its objectivity and thoroughness. I draw the House's attention to his statement in the report, in which he vouches for the validity of the conclusions drawn from these documents. On the question of President Waldheim's alleged post-war involvement with foreign intelligence services and his election to the United Nations, I do not intend to break the practice of successive Governments by commenting on such matters but I commend detailed consideration of the report.

Research has concentrated on the main archives in this country, in Germany and America, but other archives were consulted, as well as individuals whose wartime service was of relevance or who had some other expertise to offer. Although it can never be said that any historic report is definitively the last word, I am satisfied that the investigation has produced, from the thousands of documents examined, what we believe to be the main relevant records. These have established a pattern showing the events, and the responsibilities of the German headquarters' officers involved in those events. We therefore feel justified in bringing this long exercise to a conclusion now, and publishing the results.

A factor in this decision has been the need to consider the feelings of the relatives of the missing service men. I very much regret that it has not been possible to resolve all the outstanding questions about what finally happened to the missing service men, although I should like to assure the House that any further information that may come to light will be passed on to the families.

Cornfield Circles

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any official assistance has been given by service personnel to civilians investigating the origin of cornfield circles in Hampshire and Wiltshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I am not aware of any official assistance having been given by service personnel to civilians investigating the origin of crop circles.

Defence Technology Enterprises Limited

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many licences have been arranged by Defence Technology Enterprises Ltd.; and how many recipients are companies registered in Scotland.

Mr. Neubert: Defence Technology Enterprises Ltd. has arranged 38 licences. Two are with companies registered in Scotland.

Equipment Orders

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many major equipment orders are currently based on the fixed price system; and what assessment he has made of the effect of current rates of inflation on these contracts.

Mr. Neubert: The information sought could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Expenditure

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how much of the research and development of the 1989-90 procurement programme will be spent in (a) Scotland (b) south-east England, respectively; and what is the proportion each represents of the total;

(2) what is his estimate of expenditure in (a) Scotland and (b) south-east England in 1989-90 for research and development as set out in table 2.3 of Cm. 675-II.

Mr. Neubert: Estimates of regional expenditure on research and development are not available and could be produced only with disproportionate cost. Estimates of regional expenditure on equipment in the United Kingdom for 1985-86 and 1986-87 are however given in table 6.9 of "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1989 —Volume 2".

Pay Review Body (Representations)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what avenues are available to other ranks to provide the armed forces pay review body with their views on pay and allowances.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Members of the armed forces pay review body visit a number of service establishments in the United Kingdom and overseas each year as part of its annual review of service pay. During the course of these visits they meet service men and women of every rank, with the express aim of obtaining at first hand their views on pay and allowances.

NATO Ministerial Meeting

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when is the next meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation planning group ministerial meeting.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The next meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's nuclear planning group will take place on 24-25 October 1989.

"Way Ahead for NATO"

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the complete report on the "Way Ahead for NATO", referred to in paragraph 229, page 11 of Cm. 675-I, is expected to be published.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The NATO publication "A Comprehensive Concept of Arms Control and Disarmament" was issued with the NATO summit communique on 30 May 1989. A copy was placed in the Library of the House in June 1989.

Recruitment

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the armed forces pay review body has been asked to take special account of the demographic trough and its potential effect on recuitment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Armed Forces Pay Review Body has been informed of the implications of the demographic trough for the services, as well as of the wide range of measures being taken to help ensure that the services are adequately manned in the 1990s.

Antarctic Hydrography

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what programme of hydrography is currently being carried out in the Antarctic by HMS Endurance; what policy is being pursued in conjunction with the International Hydrographic Bureau to co-ordinate information from Admiralty charts with those produced by other countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: HMS Endurance undertakes annual hydrographic surveys of the western shores of the Antarctic peninsula. The Ministry of Defence supplies details of hydrographic work carried out by the United Kingdom to the International Hydrographic Bureau. The information is then re-published in the "International Hydrographic Bulletin", which is available to all hydrographic offices. Should any of the latter require further information, they may contact the hydrographer direct.

Safety Critical Software

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress he is making on North Atlantic Treaty Organisation harmonisation in relation to defence standards 00-55 and 00-56 covering safety critical software.

Mr. Alan Clark: The United Kingdom has taken the lead in setting out the requirements for safety critical software to meet the needs of the late 1990s. The draft defence standards 00-55 and 00-56 have been given extensive distribution for comment within the United Kingdom and internationally. NATO is using 00-55 and 00-56 as source documents for its own guideline documents.

It is important for international standards covering safety critical software to meet the requirements of both the civil and defence sectors, and to be accepted by the widest possible range of countries. The Ministry of Defence is therefore working closely with other Government Departments in seeking to harmonise the approaches of the United Kingdom defence and civil sectors. The United Kingdom position will, in due course, be presented to the International Electrotechnical Commission (IEC), a body with a very wide membership, which has recently started to develop international standards for safety-related systems and the computers and software used in them. Other countries, including NATO members, will present their views to the IEC in a similar way.

The Ministry of Defence is taking into account the work of the IEC as part of the process of consultation on the draft defence standards 00-55 and 00-56 before they are issued as interim standards, and it will continue to aim for alignment with civil standards in any future revisions.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the achievements of his Department and his policies in helping small businesses over the last 12 months compared with the previous 12 months; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Neubert [pursuant to the reply, 24 July 1989, col. 554]: Due to an arithmetical error an incorrect figure was shown. The number of small firms receiving payment on direct contract has increased from some 4,000 in 1986-87 to over 5,500 in 1988-89 (not 7,000 as previously shown).

NORTHERN IRELAND

Playgrounds (Safety)

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to seek to improve safety standards of playing surfaces of children's playgrounds.

Dr. Mawhinney: The design and construction of playgrounds and play areas in schools must conform to standards recommended by the Department of Education. These standards have recently been revised and improvements introduced. The provision and maintenance, including safety standards, of public recreational facilities are the responsibility of district councils.

GCSE Results

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for the four weeks following the release of the GCSE results how many U grades were amended to higher grades; how many of these were allocated to each higher grade; and at which schools were the pupils who had changed results.

Dr. Mawhinney: Available information relates to candidates with the Northern Ireland Schools Examinations Council only. Two hundred and twenty U grades were amended to higher grades as follows:

Regrade
A	9
B	30
C	60
D	53
E	23
G	24

The following schools and colleges of further education were attended by candidates with changed results:

Bangor Grammar School
Beechlawn Special School
Belfast College of Technology
Carrickfergus High School
Coleraine College of Further Education
Comber High School
Corpus Christi College
Dominican College, Belfast
Glengormley High School
Gransha Boys' High School
Grosvenor High School
Hopefield High School
Laurelhill High School
Little Flower Secondary School
Monkstown Community School
Newry High School
Newry Technical College
Newtownabbey College of Further Education
North Down College of Further Education
North West College of Technology
Portadown College of Further Education
Rupert Stanley College of Further Education
Saintfield High School
St. Colman's High School, Strabane
St. Columb's College, Londonderry
St. Dominic's High School
St. Patrick's Boys' Academy
St. Patrick's High School, Banbridge
Sullivan Upper School
The Royal School, Armagh

Urban Development Grants (Belfast)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for which areas of the city of Belfast applications for urban development grants are still approved.

Mr. Needham: Urban development grant applications may, in principle, still be accepted throughout the Belfast city council area. However, in February 1988, it was decided that, since demand exceeded resources, funds should be focused upon the areas of greatest need in the city.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for urban development grants for projects at Royal avenue, Belfast have been approved in each of the past five years.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is as follows:

	Numbers
1985	1
1986	2
1987	5
1988	2
1989*	2

* To date.

Strangford Lough

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) representations in total and (b) objections he has received in connection with the proposal for a declaration of an area of special scientific interest at Strangford lough; and what proposals he has to rescind or modify this declaration of an area of special scientific interest.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Scientific advisers have said the ASSI declaration is justified. We have consulted/discussed the proposed declaration over 580 times with affected local owners and local users, among others. Eighty individuals or groups have made representations or objections, or a mixture of the two, in writing. These responses will be carefully considered before a final decision is taken to confirm, with or without modification, or rescind the declaration.

Pet Foods Plant, Castlereagh

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many objections he has received to the planning application for change of use from light engineering to pet foods processing for premises at 268 Balygowan road, Crossnacreevy, Castlereagh; what assessment has been made of potential smells from the proposed plant; what is the shortest distance from the proposed food plant to residential property; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: I have today written to the right hon. Gentleman giving the information requested.

Planning Applications, Newtownards

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many objections were received in connection with planning application No. X/89/0611 for a proposed bungalow at 82/90 Ballybunden road, Killinchy, Newtownards; what was the closing date for receipt of objections; on what date he issued a planning decision; and on what date work commenced on site;

(2) how many persons objected to planning application No. X/89/0175 for the conversion of a dwelling at 21 Ann street, Newtownards into two self-contained flats; what was the decision of Ards borough council in relation to this application; what is his planning decision; and what complaints have been received in relation to these premises in the past 12 months.

Mr. Needham: I have today written to the right hon. Gentleman giving the information requested.

Housing, Ards and Castlereagh

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are on the waiting list for homes in the boroughs of Ards and Castlereagh; how many homes were constructed by the Housing Executive in these two boroughs during each of the past five years; and how many new homes are planned by the Housing Executive in these two boroughs in each of the next five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: These are matters for the Housing Executive, but I am advised by the chairman that over 700 new homes are planned for Ards and Castlereagh in the next five years and that at 31 August 1989 the number of people on the waiting list in the boroughs of Ards and Castlereagh was 877 and 846 respectively.

The number of new dwellings started by the Housing Executive in the two boroughs in each of the past five years and the number planned in each of the next five years is shown in the table. Figures for individual years in the period 1991-94 are not available.

	New Starts					Planned New Starts
Boroughs	84-85	85-86	86-87	87-88	88-89	89-90	90-91	91-94
Ards	64	50	63	66	104	40	173	246
Castlereagh	93	—	16	62	35	62	8	280

Prison Population

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners there are of each denomination at each prison in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Cope: The information that is readily available is set out in the table:

	Belfast	Maze	Maghaberry	Magilligan	YOC
Roman Catholic	256	312	111	126	75
Church of Ireland	112	60	71	49	38
Presbyterian	118	50	45	52	30
Free Presbyterian	17	55	32	15	?
Methodist	21	12	8	7	2
Others	36	23	24	14	4

Ballyoran Primary School

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the condition of the former Ballyoran primary school; when he received an application from Castlereagh borough council to take over this school; and when he proposes to make a decision.

Dr. Mawhinney: The premises of the former Ballyoran primary school, which are owned by the South-Eastern education and library board, are in a poor condition as a result of considerable vandalism.

The Department of Education first received an inquiry from Castlereagh borough council regarding the possibility of grant-aid towards the purchase of the former Ballyoran primary school on 22 September 1987.

The Department has no objection to the acquisition by the council of these premises. However, the terms of the disposal of the premises and the land are matters for consideration in the first instance by the South-Eastern education and library board.

Traffic (Comber)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on traffic conditions in the centre of Comber; and what is the present programme for the construction of Comber by-pass.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Traffic difficulties exist in Comber particularly at peak hours. Stage 2 of the Comber bypass is programmed to commence in April 1992.

Electricity Charges

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what dates in 1988 and 1989 the fixed charges in the Northern Ireland Electricity accounts for both domestic and commercial consumers were increased; and what were the percentage increases in each case.

Mr. Needham: Northern Ireland Electricity's fixed (standing) charges increased on 1 April in each of these two years. The increases were 6·6 per cent. and 20·9 per cent. respectively for domestic and 7·6 per cent. and 36·1 per cent. for commercial consumers. After taking account of changes in unit charges, the average overall increases in NIE tariffs were 9 per cent. and 6·1 per cent. respectively in the two years.

Cairnshill Filling Station, Castlereagh

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the restrictions for opening hours in the planning permission for Cairnshill filling station, 221 Smithfields road, Castlereagh, BT8, Co. Down.

Mr. Needham: I have today written to the right hon. Gentleman giving the information requested.

Urban Development Grant

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his policy on accepting new applications for urban development grants for projects in the towns of Enniskillen, Omagh, Strabane, Armagh, Dungannon and Cookstown.

Mr. Needham: There are insufficient resources under the urban development grant scheme (which is funded by moneys voted by Parliament) to pay grants outside Belfast and Londonderry. The International Fund for Ireland has made grants available in district towns and other urban areas under the urban development programme. I have asked the chairman of the fund board to write to the right hon. Gentleman.

Egg Production

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the latest figure for egg production in Northern Ireland; what it was 12 months prior to that date; and if he will make a statement on the future of egg production.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The high-quality egg industry in Northern Ireland makes, and will continue to make, a valuable contribution to the local economy. The estimated throughput of graded eggs at Northern Ireland's registered packing stations for the week ending 1 October 1989 was 37,000 cases (30 dozen eggs per case), compared with 43,000 cases in the corresponding week in 1988. The level of throughput is below that of the year before, but average price levels are substantially higher.

Traffic, Shaw's Bridge

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the planned traffic density from the proposed new hotel on the site of the former playing fields of Stranmillis college at Shaw's bridge, Castlereagh; whether he has approved this increase of traffic on to the main road at Shaw's bridge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: I have today written to the right hon. Gentleman giving the information requested.

Ballyvester Primary School

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the present enrolment at Ballyvester primary school; what was the enrolment at this school during each of the past five years; how many new pupils were admitted to the school at the beginning of the new academic year; and how many applications for admission to Ballyvester primary school for the current academic year were refused.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is as follows:

	Enrolment: pupils
January 1985	54
January 1986	71
January 1987	77
January 1988	75
January 1989	77
September 1989	78

In September 1989, 13 pupils were admitted; 16 were refused admission.

Vehicle Testing Centre, Newtownards

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the present waiting period to have vehicles tested at the Department of Environment vehicle testing centre in Newtownards; what change has taken place in the levels of employment at this centre during the past 12 months; what complaints he has received about delays at this centre; what proposals he has to privatise vehicle testing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The waiting time is too long. The present appointment waiting time for vehicle tests at the Newtownards centre is five weeks for goods vehicles and five and a half weeks for private cars.

There has been no change in the levels of employment at this centre during the past 12 months. One vacancy since August, due to promotion, will be filled this month.

We are not aware of specific written complaints about delays at this centre.

We have commissioned management consultants to review the present vehicle testing arrangements and to propose how the function might be carried out in future. The Department of Environment is currently considering the consultants' report and will consult the unions before deciding on proposals to achieve a better service for vehicle users.

Wind Mill, Ballycopeland

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what planning permission exists for the hill adjacent to the Wind Mill, Ballycopeland, Millisle; when this permission expires; and what current planning applications for this site are under consideration.

Mr. Needham: I have today written to the right hon. Gentleman giving the information requested.

Drumadoon Drive, Ballybeen

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has for improvements at Drumadoon drive, Ballybeen relating to road safety; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We will keep the incidence of injury accidents on the road under investigation. We will consider remedial action if this proves necessary.

Grahamsbridge Road, Dundonald

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has for improvements at Grahamsbridge road, Dundonald; when is it expected that work will commence on site; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: An improvement scheme is planned at Grahamsbridge road, Dundonald. It will embrace the widening of the existing carriageway, provision of a footway and improvement of sightlines. Work on site should start in January 1990.

Day-trippers

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent representations he has made about the present restrictions imposed upon day-trippers visiting Northern Ireland by the Government of the Republic of Ireland; when he last discussed this subject at a meeting of the Anglo-Irish Ministerial Council; when he last made representations to the Commission of the European Community about this subject; and when this matter will be heard by the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg.

Mr. Brooke: We have made clear to the Irish Government through a number of channels, including the Intergovernmental Conference, our concern about their restrictions on travellers' allowances. When the restrictions were imposed in 1987, we brought them to the attention of the European Commission, who later the same year referred the case to the European Court of Justice. Written pleadings have been exchanged at the court, and the United Kingdom has submitted observations in support of the Commission. The court declared the written procedure closed in August, but has not yet fixed a date for oral hearing.

Belfast Urban Area Plan

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he proposes to publish the report of the public inquiry into the Belfast urban area plan.

Mr. Needham: The Department of Environment for Northern Ireland received the second and final part of the Planning Appeals Commission's report on 4 October. The Department is at present considering the report and will publish it along with its adoption statement on the Belfast urban area plan as soon as possible.

Prison Chaplains

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which churches have appointed chaplains to each of the prisons in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Cope: The Roman Catholic Church, the Church of Ireland, the Presbyterian Church and the Methodist Church have each appointed chaplains to each of the prisons in Northern Ireland.

Lagan College (Chaplains)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which religious denominations have appointed chaplains to the integrated school at Lagan college.

Dr. Mawhinney: The appointment of chaplains to schools is a matter for school authorities.

Education and Libraries Orders

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions in each of the past 10 years the Department of Education exercised its power of direction in the case of education and library boards for acting or proposing to act unreasonably in the discharge of their functions under the Education and Libraries (Northern Ireland) Orders.

Dr. Mawhinney: Two such directions were issued to education and library boards in 1983.

SCOTLAND

Wick and Dornoch Sheriff Courts

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list in the Official Report the number of community service orders and referrals which have been made by (a) the Wick sheriff court and (b) the Dornoch sheriff court in each year since the community service scheme commenced in Caithness and Sutherland in September 1985, giving the category of offence to which the orders related;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the number of fines imposed by (a) the Wick sheriff court and (b) the Dornoch sheriff court in 1986 and each subsequent year, giving the category of offence to which the fines related;

(3) if he will list in the Official Report the number of those who have received custodial sentences of less than 12 months at (a) the Wick sheriff court and (b) the Dornoch sheriff court in 1986 and each subsequent year, giving the category of offence to which the sentences related.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information available is set out in the table. Crimes have been grouped using the Scottish Home and Health Department's classification of crimes and offences. Information on community service referrals is not collected centrally.

Fines

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the numbers, by sex, of those received into prison in default of fine payments in the most recent year for which figures are available, and for each of the five preceding years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is set out in the table.

Number of males and females received into penal establishments in Scotland and default of fine payments

Year	Males	Females
1983	8,772	557
1984	8,431	452
1985	10,829	735
1986	9,969	657
1987	10,365	618
[1]1988	9,170	544

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration he has given to the introduction of day or unit fines.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We have given thorough consideration to the responses which we received earlier this year to our consultation document on fines and fine enforcement which discussed, among other aspects, the day or unit fine and we hope to be in a position to announce our proposals shortly.

European City of Culture

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is allocating any additional funds to the city of Glasgow to use during its year as European city of culture.

Mr. Lang: The Government are contributing £0.5 million directly to the European City of Culture 1990. In addition, Government-funded bodies are committing significant resources in support of particular events taking place in 1990.

Charities

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to publish his conclusions on the responses to the consultative memorandum on the supervision of charities in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Later this month copies will be made available in the Library in the normal manner.

Scottish Homes

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many applications by Scottish Homes of persons approved by them have been served on public sector landlords with a view to acquiring housing;

(2) how many groups to date have been approved by Scottish Homes as suitable landlords for the purchase of public sector houses under secure tenancies;

(3) if it is the intention of Scottish Homes to set out a model lease to which persons seeking its approval as a landlord would be expected to adhere.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: To date no application has been served on any public sector landlord, in terms of section 58 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988, either by Scottish Homes or by persons approved by them. As yet, no formal applications have been submitted to Scottish Homes by persons seeking to acquire approved landlord status under section 57 of that Act.

In considering an applicant's suitability to be registered as an approved landlord, Scottish Homes does not intend to impose as a condition of approval that landlords implement a model lease. However, it will be a requirement of approval that a clear written tenancy agreement is made available to all tenants. Scottish Homes will provide advice to applicant landlords on a number of conditions which they would expect to be covered in the tenancy agreement. Approval of a landlord will be dependent on the landlord's agreement to meeting these conditions.

Greater Glasgow Health Board

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many public relations officers are now employed by Greater Glasgow health board; and what was the comparable figure two years ago.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Greater Glasgow health board employs three public relations officers; the board employed one two years ago.

Nursery Schools

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the capital and revenue costs of providing nursery school places for all children in the three to five year age group.

Mr. Lang: On the assumption that the present proportion of part-time to full-time nursery places is maintained and on the basis of current unit costs, it is estimated that the total annual revenue cost of providing nursery education for all three and four-year-olds would be £113 million. It is not possible realistically to estimate what the associated capital cost might be.

Sheriff Courts

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce legislation to extend judicial review capacity to sheriff courts.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate regards it as entirely appropriate that, as part of the supervisory jurisdiction of the Court of Session, judicial review is carried out only by certain nominated judges of that court. He has no proposals to introduce legislation to provide for judicial review by sheriffs.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by health board the fees paid to consultants at the nearest available date for work undertaken in connection with competitive tendering.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally.

Salmon

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he has received from the advisory committee on salmon stocks about the genetic danger to wild salmon stocks that is likely to result from the release or escape of farmed salmon into the wild environment; and what was the first date of any such advice.

Mr. Ian Lang: Fisheries Ministers have not asked the Salmon Advisory Committee to provide advice or recommendations on the subject of possible genetic interaction between farmed salmon and wild salmon stocks. Informally the chairman of the Salmon Advisory Committee has drawn attention to the possible relevance of work of the Nature Conservancy Council in this field to codes of practice on restocking salmon rivers. This subject is not, however, one which we have specifically asked the Salmon Advisory Council to include in its already extensive programme of work.

Aphids

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his review of his Department's research on aphids and aphid-borne diseases.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Our aim is to take decisions on the future of aphid trapping and monitoring work in Scotland later this year after the Scottish aphid-borne virus working party has reported. I shall write to the hon. Member to inform him of these decisions in due course. Meanwhile the current level of aphid monitoring in Scotland will be maintained.

Electricity Boards

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland by what date the Scottish electricity boards are required to submit their annual reports and accounts.

Mr. Lang: The report and accounts direction issued on 29 September 1989, copies of which have been deposited in the Library of the House, requires the South of Scotland electricity board and the North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board to submit their annual reports and accounts by 31 December.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Lorrain Osman

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made in respect of an invalid arrest warrant issued by the Hong Kong authorities on 30 November 1985, in relation to Lorrain Osman, currently held in the United Kingdom pending extradition proceedings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: Since this matter is currently sub judice, it would not be appropriate for us to comment.

Hong Kong

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, under the joint agreement, the National People's Congress of the People's Republic of China after 30 June 1997 will maintain reserve rights to amend the basic law of the Special Administrative Region of Hong Kong and to review the constitutionality of the local laws of the Special Administrative Region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: Article 158 of the current draft of the Basic Law vests the power of amendment of the Basic Law in the National People's Congress. It states that no amendment to the Basic Law shall contravene the established basic policies of the PRC regarding Hong Kong. These are set out in paragraph 3 and elaborated in annex 1 of the Sino-British Joint Declaration.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he now estimates that close co-operation can be restored between the United Kingdom and the People's Republic of China authorities; to what extent such restored co-operation could lead to a full implementation of the Joint Declaration on the future of Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: The thirteenth meeting of the Sino-British joint liaison group, which took place from 27 to 29 September, marked the restoration of formal consultation with the People's Republic of China over Hong Kong. The communiqué which issued from that meeting stated that both sides had reaffirmed their continued determination to abide by the Joint Declaration and to fulfil the various responsibilities it lays down.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom Government's right to pursue diplomatic claims on behalf of Hong Kong citizens of BNO status is covered by the agreement with the Government of China.

Mr. Maude: The British memorandum associated with the Sino-British Joint Declaration on the question of Hong Kong makes clear that from 1 July 1997 those British Dependent Territories Citizens (BDTCs) from Hong Kong, who have by then elected to become BN(O)s and to travel on BN(O) passports, will be entitled to consular services and protection in third countries. The Chinese memorandum indicates that such passports may continue to be used from 1 July 1997, although, in accordance with normal practice in cases of dual nationality, BN(O)s will not be entitled to consular protection by the United Kingdom Government in the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, or in other parts of China.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what legal opinions his Department has obtained on the nationality status of persons born in Hong Kong when sovereignty passes to China in 1997.

Mr. Maude: The Chinese memorandum to the Sino-British Joint Declaration states that under Chinese nationality law, all Hong Kong Chinese are Chinese nationals. The British memorandum makes clear that all Hong Kong British Dependent Territories citizens will, from 1 July 1997, be eligible to retain an appropriate status which will entitle them to continue to use passports issued by the Government of the United Kingdom. It also provides that that status will be acquired by BDTCs only if they hold, or are included in, a BN(O) passport issued before 1 July 1997, except that eligible persons born on or after 1 January 1997, but before 1 July 1997, may obtain or be included in such a passport up to 31 December 1997.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has taken legal opinion on whether under international law the citizens of Hong Kong will upon transfer of sovereignty to China become de jure Chinese nationals.

Mr. Maude: In accordance with the exchange of memoranda associated with the Sino-British Joint Declaration on Hong Kong, all persons who on 30 June 1997 are, by virtue of a connection with Hong Kong, British Dependent Territories Citizens (BDTCs) under the law in the United Kingdom, will cease to be BDTCs with effect from 1 July 1997, but will be eligible to retain the status of British Nationals (Overseas). At the same time, under the nationality law of the People's Republic of China, all Hong Kong Chinese compatriots, whether they are BDTCs or not, are Chinese nationals.

Soviet Submarines

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Soviet Government regarding the threat to the environment from nuclear-powered Soviet submarines.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

European Community

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement setting out the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the future development of the EEC.

Mr. Maude: Britain will remain a full and active participant in the development of the European Community. Our top priority is the completion of the single market on time, bringing down the barriers inside Europe and staying open to the world outside. We are contributing fully to discussions in all areas of Community activity.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he intends to take in cases where the Commission of the EEC presents directives which appear to exceed the powers conferred under the Treaty of Rome and the Single Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave him on 19 May. We shall decide our response as and when such cases arise.

Antarctic

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Paris meeting on the Antarctic.

Mr. Sainsbury: The fifteenth Antarctic treaty consultative meeting is still in progress. Its final report will be adopted on 20 October.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking to promote the establishment of an Antarctic treaty secretariat.

Mr. Sainsbury: At the fifteenth Antarctic treaty consultative meeting currently being held in Paris, our delegation will be pressing for a decision in principle that an Antarctic treaty secretariat should be established.

Federal Republic of Germany

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he is next meeting his West German counterpart; and what matters will be discussed.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary met Herr Genscher on 20 September when they discussed a broad range of issues. They are likely to meet again soon, although no specific date has been arranged.

Namibia and Angola

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implementation of United Nations security resolution 435 in Namibia and Angola.

Mr. Waldegrave: Elections to a constituent assembly in Namibia will take place from 7 to 11 November. We will continue to give full support to the United Nations' efforts to ensure that the elections are free and fair, and to assist in a peaceful transition to independence.

Chile

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further meetings Her Majesty's Ambassador to Chile has had with opposition parties and human rights groups; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Sainsbury: Her Majesty's ambassador in Chile and his staff have had, and continue to have, frequent meetings and wide-ranging discussions with human rights groups and opposition parties. A full list is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Turkey (Kurdish people)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further representations he has made to the Government of Turkey concerning abuses of human rights and the treatment of Kurdish people.

Mr. Maude: I shall be meeting the Under-Secretary of the Turkish Foreign Ministry later today. I shall make it clear that, while we welcome the improvement in Turkey's human rights record described by Mr. Ozal in his address to the Council of Europe on 27 September, it remains important that the Turkish Government should respect and abide by the terms of the international conventions to which they are a party.

Policy Implementation

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out his Department's (a) successes and (b) failures of policy implementation since May 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the written answers given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 28 April and by my right hon. Friend the then Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, on 2 May, to the questions from the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn).

Non-proliferation Treaty

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department met with President Sheikh Zayed Bin Sultan Al Nahyan of the United Arab Emirates during his recent visit to London, to discuss (a) nuclear weapons proliferation in the Middle East Gulf Region and (b) initiatives that may be taken at the fourth review conference of the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. But we have made it clear on many occasions that we would welcome the adherence of the United Arab Emirates to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what correspondence his Department has received in the last six months on the issue of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office regularly receives correspondence touching on nuclear-related issues, including non-proliferation, from organisations and members of the public.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have taken place since July with other governments on progress on preparations for the fourth review conference of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: Further discussions took place at the second preparatory committee for the fourth review conference, which was held in Geneva from 11 to 15 September.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to raise the issue of non-proliferation treaty membership with each of the governments of the non-proliferation treaty states; and what initiatives he plans to increase the total membership of the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: We regularly raise the question of accession to the treaty with non-parties at various levels. As a depositary power, the United Kingdom attaches importance to the widest possible adherence to the treaty.

South Africa (Sanctions)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what ministerial representation there was at the Commonwealth meeting of Foreign Ministers, held in Canberra in early August, to discuss sanctions on South Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

The hon. Member is presumably referring to the meeting of the Commonwealth Committee of Foreign Ministers on South Africa. Britain is not a member of the Committee.

Libya (Exports)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what restrictions there are on United Kingdom exports of civil nuclear technology and nuclear materials to Libya.

Mr. Waldegrave: All United Kingdom exports of nuclear technology and materials continue to be governed by the policy set out by the then Foreign Secretary on 31 March 1976.

Compensation Orders (China)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many offers of settlement have been made under the Foreign Compensation (People's Republic of China) Order 1987; under what categories they have been; and how many of these offers have so far been accepted.

Mr. Sainsbury: A final offer cannot be made until the Foreign Compensation Commission has completed determination of all claims, including property claims, against the China Fund. This is not expected until autumn 1990. However, in January an interim payment of 5 per cent. of the value assigned by the commission to a bond was announced to bond claimants. Out of 1,717 bond claimants to whom offer of interim payment has been made, 1,592 had accepted the offer as of 29 September 1989.

Gibraltar

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many meetings in the past 12 months have been held at (a) ministerial level and (b) senior Civil Service levels with Gibraltarian authorities about matters concerned with the European Community.

Mr. Maude: European Community matters affecting Gibraltar have been discussed at ministerial level with the Gibraltar Government four times in the last 12 months. There have been frequent contacts at official level.

Statelessness

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will cite the occasions where the United Kingdom has engaged in treaty making or other international agreement which complies with article 10 of the United Nations convention on reduction of statelessness.

Mr. Sainsbury: When the United Kingdom has transferred territory by treaty in the circumstances envisaged in the United Nations convention since 1966, the date when the convention became binding on the United Kingdom, appropriate arrangements for nationality have been made in compliance with that article.

Drug Seizures

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list United Kingdom and United Kingdom dependencies flag vessels seized by the United States under the 13 November 1981 exchanges of notes concerning co-operation in the suppression of the unlawful importation of narcotic drugs into the United States, showing the date seized, the drugs found, the number of persons arrested and indicate any judicial penalties imposed.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am arranging for copies of a list showing the British vessels seized under the 1981 Exchange of Notes, the date seized, the drugs found and the number of persons arrested to be deposited in the Library of the House.

We are seeking information on the penalties imposed in each case. I shall write to the hon. Member in due course.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the United States authorities to clarify the geographic scope of the 13 November 1981 exchange of notes concerning co-operation in the suppression of the unlawful importation of narcotic drugs into the United States and to strengthen both reporting requirements and dispute resolution procedures; and if he will make a statement on the efficacy of the agreement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Since the Exchange of Notes was concluded in 1981 we have been in contact with the Americans about various aspects of the agreement. In our view, the agreement works satisfactorily; it is helping the fight against the clandestine import of drugs in the area to which the agreement relates. It is not our practice to disclose details relating to the operation of such agreements.

United Kingdom High Commission, Nicosia

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff there are in the United Kingdom High Commission in Nicosia, Cyprus; how many of the staff are (a) Greek Cypriots and (b) Turkish Cypriots; and what steps are taken to monitor these proportions relative to the size of each of the communities on the island.

Mr. Maude: There are 76 staff altogether in the High Commission. Of these, 40 are locally engaged, including six Greek Cypriots and four Turkish Cypriots.

Recruitment of locally engaged staff takes place on the basis of ability, not ethnic origin. There are, however, practical difficulties in recruiting members of one community to work in territory controlled by the other.

Ethiopian Jews

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the United Nations about the treatment of Ethiopian Jews in United Nations camps in the Sudan.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have been in touch with UNHCR. In their view there has been no discrimination in the treatment of Ethiopian refugees.

Falashas (Ethiopia)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Ethiopian Government about allowing Falashas to join their relatives in Israel.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have raised this matter with the Ethiopian authorities. Their response was that the Falasha are treated in the same way as other Ethiopians wishing to emigrate.

Geneva Convention

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will give the reasons why the United Kingdom has not yet ratified the protocols of the Geneva convention signed on 8 June 1977.

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is probably referring to the issue of ratification of the 1977 additional protocols to the Geneva conventions. We have been considering carefully the legal, political and military implications of ratification. This has involved a detailed and continuing process of consultations with our allies in NATO. Progress has been made. Final decisions on ratification will be made when that process of consultation is complete.

Drug Traffickers, Colombia

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his response to the representations from the Foreign Minister of Colombia regarding British participation in the training of mercenary personnel for employment by drug barons.

Mr. Salisbury: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs made clear when he met Sr Londoño in New York on 26 September, we condemn unequivocally and unreservedly the activities of those who work for drugs traffickers in Colombia. It is primarily for the Colombian authorities to take action in respect of offences committed in Colombia. We remain in close touch with the Colombian authorities on this issue.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many sessions of the Geneva conference on disarmament for a global chemical weapons convention have been held to date; and if he will list the participating states.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Conference on Disarmament, originally called the Committee on Disarmament, was established by the first United Nations special session on disarmament in 1978. It first met in 1979 and since then there have been two three-month sessions per year, thus totalling 22 sessions to date. The subject of chemical weapons has been on the conference's agenda from the outset. In 1983 additional shorter "inter-sessional" consultations specifically on chemical weapons were also established. There have been 11 such "inter-sessional" meetings to date.

The 40 members states of the Conference on Disarmament are Algeria, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burma, Canada, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Ethiopia, Federal Republic of Germany, France, German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Italy, India, Indonesia, Iran, Japan, Kenya, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Netherlands, Nigeria, Pakistan, Peru, Poland, Romania, Soviet Union, Sri Lanka, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States, Venezuela, Yugoslavia and Zaire. In addition, there are about 25 states holding observer status at the conference.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the latest Soviet responses to NATO requests for details and timescales of Soviet undertakings to destroy chemical warfare stocks.

Mr. Waldegrave: Mr. Shevardnadze announced in January that the Soviet Union would begin the destruction of its chemical weapons, CW, stockpiles in 1989 at a new facility in Chapayevsk which was being constructed for this purpose. No further information was given on the details and timescale of the destruction programme, but on 6 September it was announced that the Chapayevsk facility would not now be completed. Due to local environmentalist pressure it is to be converted to a "training centre for devising industrial methods for destroying toxic substances". No revised destruction programme has been announced but it appears unlikely that the Soviet Union will begin destruction this year. In contrast, the United States commenced its CW destruction programme in 1970 and has to date destroyed 15 million pounds of chemical weapon agent.

Strategic Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how often the United Kingdom Government have participated directly in negotiations with the Soviet Union with the objective of securing a treaty for the reduction or elimination of strategic nuclear weapons.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have not participated in such negotiations. We have, however, made it clear that if United States and Soviet strategic arsenals were to be very substantially reduced, and if no significant change had occurred in Soviet defensive capabilities, Britain would want to review her position and to consider how best she could contribute to arms control in the light of the reduced threat.

Archbishop of Canterbury (Vatican Visit)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what facilities were extended by the British Mission to the Vatican to the Archbishop of Canterbury in the course of his recent visit to Rome: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: This was an official ecclesiastical visit. The arrangements were made by the Vatican in conjunction with Lambeth palace. Her Majesty's Ambassador to the Holy See, as a courtesy, offered a dinner for the Archbishop.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Local Management Schemes

10. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress of local management schemes for schools.

Mr. MacGregor: I am pleased to be able to announce that all local education authorities have submitted their LMS schemes. This is an impressive achievement. About 10 schemes were submitted at least a month early and we have already begun announcing our approval for the first of these to come into force next April.

Nursery Schools

13. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he proposes to make additional resources available to local education authorities to increase the provision of nursery school education.

27. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on nursery school provision.

Mrs. Rumbold: Our plans for 1989-90 allow the steady expansion of the last decade to continue. Our plans for 1990-91 will be announced in the autumn statement.

Teachers (Resignations)

14. Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the number of resignations from teachers which were submitted by 31 May.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Teachers submit their resignations to local education authorities and comprehensive information about the number of resignations in May 1989 is not yet available to the Department.

Primary School Teachers

15. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on primary school teacher shortages.

Mr. Alan Howarth: In general, across the country as a whole, there are sufficient primary school teachers and few problems of shortages. However, there are problems in some areas, particularly in inner London. Recruitment to primary initial teacher training continues to be buoyant, and there should be sufficient teachers overall to meet demand in the future.

Teacher Shortages

16. Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with present and future local education authorities in London about teacher shortages.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend's predecessor met the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), together with representatives of the Inner London education authority, on 13 June. I met the leaders of the inner London councils on 19 June, and again on 12 September, and on both occasions discussed teacher shortages. We agreed that there should be further discussions at official level.

33. Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schools do not have a full complement of teachers.

Mr. Alan Howarth: This information is not available centrally. The employment and deployment of teachers are matters for local education authorities and schools.

Teachers' Pay

17. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his policy towards teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government's policy is that teachers' pay should reflect the need to recruit, retain and motivate sufficient teachers of the right quality within what can be afforded.

32. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning teachers' pay; and what action he proposes to take.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations concerning teachers' pay. He announced the remit for the interim advisory committee's consideration of the 1990-91 pay settlement on 26 September.

Education Act 1981

18. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress he has made in preparing the revised circular of guidance regarding the implementation of the Education Act 1981.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Circular No. 22/89 was issued on Friday 29 September 1989. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Teacher Training

19. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps his Department is taking to encourage those currently in other professions to train as teachers.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The principal elements in our programme directed towards mature entrants are the new licensed teacher arrangements, the funding of special courses for graduates making a career change, the provision of "taster" courses, and the preparation of publicity material specifically directed at mature entrants.

Higher Education (Access)

20. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the Royal Society of Arts in support of improved access to higher education.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend has been kept informed of the Royal Society of Arts' initiative in establishing a project under the banner of the Industry Matters Education/Industry Forum, directed by Sir Christopher Ball, to consider the widening of access to higher education. I understand that an interim report is shortly to be published as a basis for further comment and consultation, and that the final report will follow thereafter.

City Technology Colleges

21. Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much public money has been allocated to city technology colleges; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: A total of £28·5 million has been spent on the city technology college programme between the inception of the programme and the end of September 1989. Further planned public expenditure to the end of the financial year 1991-92 is £93·8 million. The balance of expenditure between capital and recurrent costs will depend on a number of factors, including the nature and condition of premises acquired and the speed with which sponsors' plans are implemented.

30. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many city technology colleges have now been announced; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The city technology college programme is making excellent progress. Kingshurst opened last year, Nottingham and Teesside opened last month, and a further eight projects have been announced with firm opening dates in 1990 and 1991. In addition, five companies or individuals have announced their willingness to be major participants in the CTC programme.

War Studies

22. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has concerning GCSE and advanced level courses concerning the study of war and conflict subjects.

Mrs. Rumbold: The School Examinations and Assessment Council is responsible for the approval of GCSE and advanced level examination syllabuses. I am not aware of any such syllabuses concerned exclusively with the study of war and conflict subjects. The study of war and conflict is of course sometimes included as part of an examination syllabus, in subjects such as history or a humanities subject.

Educational Attainment

23. Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to improve educational attainment of the lowest 40 per cent. of schoolchildren.

Mrs. Rumbold: The national curriculum will raise standards of achievement for pupils of all ages and abilities.

School Activities (Charging)

24. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any proposals to amend the law relating to charging for school activities.

Mrs. Rumbold: The new law has been in place for only one full term. It is far too soon to make firm judgments about its effects.

Nursery Teachers

25. Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he is taking to provide himself with an accurate picture of teacher supply in nursery education.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Department collects data on vacant nursery posts. In January 1989 there were 194 vacancies. The latest primary school staffing survey shows that almost all nursery teachers had received nursery or infant specific training.

Humberside College of Higher Education

26. Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received in connection with Humberside college of higher education's proposal that it be afforded polytechnic designation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The principal of Humberside college of higher education wrote to me in 1987 asking that the college be considered for designation as a polytechnic. In our initial letter of guidance to the PCFC we invited the council to offer advice on the question of further polytechnic designations. Following its last meeting the council wrote to my right hon. Friend recommending the criteria it considered a college should satisfy to merit designation as a polytechnic. My right hon. Friend has indicated that he is inclined to agree with the PCFC's advice, but that he would welcome views from those who have an interest in the issue.

London Education Authorities

28. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from London local education authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend continues to receive representations on a range of matters.

Secondary School Teachers

29. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on secondary school teacher shortages.

Mr. Alan Howarth: In January 1989 vacancies amounted to about 1·3 per cent. of the secondary teaching force—a proportion that has remained broadly similar over many years. However, there are difficulties in filling vacancies in some areas and in some subjects. Over £50 million has been spent so far on the Department's action programme, launched in 1986 to combat these difficulties. We will continue and reinforce this programme.

Open University

31. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received during the present year regarding funding for the Open university.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend received in January and February over 100 representations from Open university students. The Open university visiting committee, which advises him on the university's plans and their financial implications has discussed with the university its funding requirements for 1990 and subsequent years. My right hon. Friend will announce the university's grant for 1990, and the indicated grants for 1991 and 1992 later this year.

Higher Education

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the cost of each student at (a) universities and (b) polytechnics for 1979 and at the latest date for which such information is available.

Mr. Jackson: The data requested are as follows. The figures show the net institutional expenditure per student at universities (Great Britain) and polytechnics (England) in cash terms.

Net institutional expenditure[1] per student

	Financial year (£)
	1979-80	1987-88
Universities[2]	3,074	5,719
Polytechnics[2]	2,515	3,356

[1] The figures for universities are based on recurrent expenditure financed by UGC grants and tuition fee income for home and overseas students. The figures for polytechnics are net recurrent institutional expenditure per full-time student. Institutional expenditure includes direct and indirect costs of providing tuition but excludes financing cost of capital expenditure.

[2] Standard weightings have been used to calculate numbers of full-time equivalent students.

Schools (Data Use)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to issue advice as to whether schools are independent data users under the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend has recently advised the Data Protection Registrar that in matters of school administration, with the exception of school registers, the governors of LEA-maintained schools hold electronic data as agents of the local education authority and are thus covered by the authority's data users licence. Governors keeping their registers on computer must however be licensed separately. The Department will issue guidance on this subject to authorities and schools in the near future.

Autistic Children

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidelines he provides for the diagnosis and statementing of autistic children for (a) pre-nursery and (b) pre-school.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Secretary of State does not provide such guidelines; this is a matter for local education authorities. General advice to LEAs on their duties under the Education Act 1981 in relation to the making of assessments and statements of special educational need is contained in circular No. 22/89 which was issued on 29 September. I have made arrangements for the hon. Member to receive a copy of this circular, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Meteorology and Atmospheric Physics

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if there was any ministerial or departmental representation at the fifth assembly of the International Association of Meteorology and Atmospheric Physics held at Reading university in July and August.

Mr. Jackson: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment gave the opening address at this scientific conference, which was attended by numerous scientists from the science research councils active in the fields involved.

Institute of Meat Research

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what approaches have been made by any governments to Her Majesty's Government concerning the Institute of Meat Research in Bristol; if he will publish details; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: No such approaches have been received.

Student Unions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on plans to reform student unions.

Mr. Jackson: We published our survey of student unions on 27 September. My right hon. Friend will come forward with proposals for changes in due course.

Student Loans

34. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement about his student loan proposals.

Mr. Jackson: The work described in my right hon. Friend's statement on 19 June—Official Report columns 21-22—is proceeding. We shall announce further details in due course.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how he intends to reimburse banks for the branch cost of administering student loan repayments, deferrals and defaults; and if he will now estimate branch costs;

(2) pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Oxford, East of 24 July, Official Report, column 442, if he will publish the detailed analysis and cost-time estimates on the administration of the student loans scheme;

(3) pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Oxford, East of 24 July, Official Report column 441, if he will now publish his assessment of the recurring costs of student loans administration in each year beyond 1995 (a) in total and (b) per account.

Mr. Jackson: I cannot comment at this stage on matters which are subject to contractual negotiations. As we have made clear, the House will be informed of the major steps in the preparations for administration of the loans.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has held, or plans to hold, with building societies concerning his proposed top-up loans for students scheme.

Mr. Jackson: The discussions with the financial institutions described in my right hon. Friend's statement on 19 June include representation of the building societies.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if student loan debt collection agencies will have access to (a) the poll tax register, (b) the electoral register and (c) national insurance records;

(2) what records student loan debt collection agencies will have access to.

Mr. Jackson: The loans administration company will have access to the normal range of public documents in addition to the information provided by students in making their applications.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) Official Report, 24 July, column 442, concerning the next stage of the detailed analysis of the top-up loans scheme, whether this has now been completed; and if he will place a copy in the Library.

Mr. MacGregor: When Price Waterhouse's stage 2 report is completed, I shall place in the Library of the House copies of the report other than those parts which are commercially confidential.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has managed any evaluation of the employment career development loan scheme piloted by the Department of Employment, in the context of his student proposals.

Mr. MacGregor: No. The national scheme of career development loans was introduced in July 1988. The clientele for which it is intended is quite different from that for top-up loans.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cereals

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1973 (a) the (i) guide, (ii) intervention, (iii) threshold and (iv) other prices for cereals and (b) the co-responsibility levies together with (1) the amount produced, (2) the surplus production, (3) the amount taken into intervention, (4) the corresponding world price and (5) the cost to the EEC of (x) intervention, (y) storage and (z) export refunds.

Mr. Curry: Details of the target, threshold and intervention prices for common wheat and barley since 1973 are given in table A. In addition, a separate buying-in price has operated since 1987-88 at 94 per cent. of the intervention price.

The cereals co-responsibility levy was introduced from the start of the 1986-87 marketing year. In its first two years of operation, the rate was set at 5·38 ecu-tonne. In 1988-89 the basic levy remained at 5·38 ecu-tonne, but there was also an additional levy of 2·87 ecu-tonne. in 1989-90 the basic levy is 5·22 ecu-tonne and the provisional rate of the additional levy is also 5·22 ecu-tonne. The latter will be reduced if the 1989 Community harvest does not exceed the maximum guaranteed quantity of 160 million tonnes by 3 per cent. or more.

Details of European Community cereals production, the difference between production and consumption, and the amount taken into intervention are given in table B. There is no single representative measure of world price for cereals.

Details of EC expenditure on cereals intervention storage and export refunds are given in table C.

EC Support

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1988 and 1987 the amount each European Economic Community state received from the European Economic Community by way of support for agriculture, the percentage share of the total, and the amount paid into the European Economic Community as a percentage of own resources payments.

Mr. Maclean: The attached table shows by member state the amount and percentage share of expenditure from the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund (EAGGF) in 1987 and 1988, and the amount and percentage share of own resource payments in 1987. Own resource figures for 1988 are not available as the European Court of Auditors report for 1988 will not be published by the Commission until December 1989.

EC (Membership Cost)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will bring up to date table M in his Department's submission to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on the "Financial and Economic Consequences of United Kingdom Membership of the European Economic Community" (HC Paper 57-II) of Session 1984-85.

Mr. Curry: Estimates are no longer prepared on the basis requested. Detailed information on the incomes, assets and liabilities of farm businesses by farm type and country is contained within the 1989 edition of "Farm Incomes in the United Kingdom," a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Guaranteed Prices

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the ratio of the United Kingdom guaranteed price for (a) cereals, (b) dairy products, (c) oils and fats and (d) edible meats in: (i) 1988 and (ii) 1968.

Mr. MacLean: Details of guaranteed prices determined for 1968-69 are set out in the "Annual Review and Determination of Guarantees 1968" (Cmnd. 3558) pp 44-45, which is available in the Library of the House. Information on support prices for 1988-89 is contained in the note on common agricultural policy prices settlement 1988-89 which was deposited in the Library of the House on 4 August 1988.

Zoonoses Testing

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to what extent (a) broiler chickens, (b) turkeys and (c) egg-laying flocks have been subject to zoonoses testing; and why there are differences in the frequency thereof.

Mr. Curry: The Testing of Poultry Flocks Order 1989 requires all commercial laying flocks of domestic fowls, and flocks over 25 birds supplying eggs or birds for breeding purposes, to be tested for salmonella at eight-week intervals. These requirements, introduced as part of the Government's measures to tackle the problem of salmonella in eggs, are shortly to be replaced by new provisions which inter alia will extend the requirements relating to breeding flocks to cover turkeys.

There is no requirement for testing of broiler birds but the provisions on breeding flocks apply to broiler breeders and will be used as the basis for necessary control measures when infection is found.

New Zealand Lamb

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report the landed price before payment of duty of imports of New Zealand lamb in 1988, 1978 and 1968 together with (i) the average New Zealand export price, (ii) the corresponding price paid to British farmers, (iii) imports from New Zealand and Australia and (iv) United Kingdom production, imports, exports and consumption of sheepmeat.

Mr. Curry: The average cif price (the nearest equivalent to a 'landed' price) for New Zealand lamb was 103 pence/kg (p/kg) in 1988. No figures are available for 1968 and 1978 or for average fob export prices.

The average prices (including variable premium) paid to British farmers for lamb have been as follows:

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions the Forestry Commission awarded grants under the broadleaved woodland grant scheme in England, between its inception in 1985 and closure in 1988; and on how many occasions the grant of £100 for obtaining professional advice, in the preparation of a plan of operation under the scheme, was awarded.

Mr. Maclean: To date, the Forestry Commission has approved 5,159 applications for grant under the broadleaved woodland grant scheme in England. The grant of £100 has been paid on 830 of those applications.

Animals (Import and Export)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will tabulate in the Official Report all existing animal health and disease checks, restrictions, examinations, or certifications concerning import and export of all live animals and birds to and from the United Kingdom, with reference to their respective statutory bases, together with the relevant proposals of the Commission of the European Economic Community contained in, or foreshadowed by, documents 4183/89, 4830/89 and 5057/89 indicating in each case, whether the proposed changes are acceptable or unacceptable to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Curry: It would be impracticable to publish in the Official Report the hundreds of import licences and export certificates which exist.

Our import conditions are designed to prevent the introduction of animal disease, and relate to the species concerned and the animal health status of the countries of origin. Among other things we may require an appropriate pre-export testing and isolation and post-import quarantine, post-import isolation plus testing.

For exports, the requirements depend on European Community rules where they exist and in other cases on those of the authorisation of the countries of destination.

The statutory basis for import licences and export certification are derived from the following orders:

Importation of Animals Order 1977
Importation of Birds, Poultry and Hatching Eggs Order 1979
Importation of Equine Animals Order 1979
Rabies (Importation of Dogs, Cats and Other Mammals) Order 1974
Exportation of Pigeons Order 1983
The Diseases of Animals (Export Health Certificates) Order 1985

As to the EC Commission's proposals for harmonised animal health rules for trade in sheep and goats (document 4183/89), bovine embryos (document 4389/89), and poultry and hatching eggs (document 5057/89) I refer the hon. Member to the explanatory memoranda, copies of which were deposited in the Library and to the debate on them which took place on 18 July at columns 294-315.

Herbicide Resistance

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department was represented at the 11th Long Ashton international symposium on herbicide resistance in weeds and crops.

Mr. Curry: The Ministry was represented by four members of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service (one of whom gave an invited talk at the symposium dinner).

Warm Water Fish

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has made any assessment of the findings of the Marine Biological Association and Plymouth marine laboratory released in August, that there have been significant increases in warm water fish species found off the south-west coast of the British Isles.

Mr. Curry: I am aware of the long hydro-biological time series referred to. Changes occur continuously for many reasons. We keep the matter under review.

National Fruit Collection

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what areas have been identified in relation to (a) climate and (b) soil conditions as a successor-home to Brogdale for the national fruit collection; what representations he has had from Wye college for taking responsibility for Brogdale; and what is his cost estimate of taking four grafts of every specimen or variety and replanting them in suitable soil conditions, on a site other than Brogdale.

Mr. Curry: The Ministry is in negotiation with two organisations, the East Malling Trust and Wye college, which have both expressed an interest in taking on the management of the national fruit collection. This would involve moving the collection from Brogdale to either East Malling or Wye respectively. Consideration of these two sites will include an assessment of the suitability of climate and soil conditions. The costs of moving the collection by propagation and replanting will vary depending on the precise arrangements but initial estimates suggest that the total costs (including all materials and labour) could be of the order of £100,000 to £150,000, which would be spread over a four or five-year period.

Agricultural Research Centres

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many agriculture research centres are funded by his Ministry.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to the reply, 29 June 1989, c. 550]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science and I have decided that the horticultural research and development carried out by the Agricultural and Food Research Council and by the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service should be integrated under a reconstituted British Society for Horticultural Research. (BSHR).

This will be headed by a small and strong executive committee, reporting to me and reflecting the tripartite partnership of my Department, my right hon. Friend's funding of the Agricultural and Food Research Council and growers, each of whom will have equal representation. Members of the committee, which will include growers, will be appointed by me and my right hon. Friend. Growers will thus have an influential and effective voice in the new organisation, which will be able to receive funds directly from a range of sources including the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Agricultural and Food Research Council and the industry.

The BSHR will have available to it the facilities at six horticultural research centres. These will be Wellesbourne (which, as already announced, will become the principal horticultural research station), East Malling (centre for fruit and other perennial crops research and development), the centre for hops research at Wye college, and the experimental horticulture stations at Kirton, Efford and Stockbridge house. The new organisation will bring together the expertise and effort of staff drawn from the AFRC and from ADAS.

The Government believe that bringing the elements of horticultural research and development together in this way will provide a sound basis for the future. Naturally, the Government's support for the BSHR will be influenced by the industry's response, since growers' support will be essential to provide the balanced programme of research and development needed to safeguard the future of British horticulture in a highly competitive international market. We believe that this new integrated organisation will command the confidence of the industry. We are sure that all the partners will work together to bring about a successful launch.

Fisheries

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to what extent his duties towards conservation and enhancement of natural beauty under section 17 of the Agriculture Act 1986 extend to fisheries matters; and if he will make a statement on the implication of these duties where they impact on fishing and fish stock management.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 26 July 1989]: My duties under section 17 of the Agriculture Act 1986 are concerned with agriculture not fisheries. However, in dealing with fisheries we are concerned with conservation of fish stocks in order to manage them as renewable resources. I also refer the hon. Gentleman to a previous reply given on 21 July 1989, Official Report, column 408.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Palace of Westminster

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Lord President of the Council what is the current cost of maintaining and running the House of Lords.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The provision required in the current year 1 April 1989 to 31 March 1990, for the expenditure of the House of Lords on peers' expenses, administrative costs, staff pensions and security totals £15,260,000.

Notes

(i) Stationery and printing cost for the House of Lords are borne on an allied service vote maintained by Her Majesty's Stationery Office. Provision for the 1989-90 totals £4,800,000.

(ii) Other services provided in support of both Houses of Parliament are:

(a) Rates on Government Property (HM Treasury) Provision for 1989-90 totals £1,200,000[1]

(b) Accommodation services (Property Services Agency of the Department of the Environment) Provision for 1989-90 totals £25,300,000[1]

[1] No separate figures are available here in respect of the amounts attributable to each House.

Community Charge

Mr. Hannan: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether right hon. and hon. Members will be entitled to reclaim the standard community charge on a second home under the additional costs allowance.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Lord President of the Council what arrangements are being made to provide an allowance to members of Parliament for the payment of the standard community charge on their second homes; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The additional cost allowance covers expenses necessarily incurred by hon. Members in maintaining a second home required for the performance of their parliamentary duties. From April 1990, the standard community charge will be one of the costs which may be incurred in maintaining a second home. In cases where there is a liability for a standard charge hon. Members will therefore be able to claim reimbursement in circumstances where they would previously have claimed for rates. Hon. Members will still pay the personal community charge at their main residence and there is no question of reimbursing this. The Fees Office will be writing to all hon. Members shortly to explain these arrangements in detail.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Spending Power

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if on a similar basis to his answer to the hon. Member for Bradford West (Mr. Madden) on 22 June, Official Report, columns 575-80, he will publish figures showing the average total weekly benefit payable to Mr. Swainston, 3 Hawthorn Park, Brandon, Durham, before and after the social security reforms of April were completely phased in.

Mr. Scott: I have written to the hon. Member.

Independent Living Fund

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether, in establishing a single budget to cover the costs of care, he proposes to take account of the existence of the independent living fund and allow it to continue funding individual disabled people to enable them to buy in the personal care they need to avoid institutionalisation.

Mr. Scott: The independent living fund has been very effective in its current form. Clearly, we will need to consider, and if necessary discuss with the trustees, whether the Government's proposals for the future organisation and funding of community care call for any adjustment to the fund.

Disability Pension (Self-employed People)

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security why self-employed persons are ineligible to claim disability pension.

Mr. Scott: The arguments for preferential industrial injuries benefit for self-employed people are not as strong as they are for employees. The consideration that a person is acting under orders does not apply and, since there is no employer, there is no place for a preferential scheme to complement and limit the employer's liability at common law.

Disabled People

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department is examining ways in which a partial capacity benefit for disabled people could be introduced; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: In examining existing benefit provision against the findings of the OPCS surveys, we shall consider the need for a partial incapacity benefit.

Income Support

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the latest figures for the number of people on income support who had direct deductions for (a) electricity and (b) gas.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The number of cases with deductions for electricity and gas is as follows:

	Number
Electricity	152,000
Gas	152,000

Where a person has deductions for both electricity and gas, they are included in both figures.

Attendance Allowance (Assessments)

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many medical practitioners examine patients for attendance allowance; how many of these are principals in general practice; how many of these are retired medical practitioners; how many of them are medical practioners without other remuneration; how many of them have a specialist psychiatric qualification; and how many of them have training in psychiatry lasting six months or more.

Mr. Scott: There are 3,742 examining medical practitioners (EMPs) in Great Britain who examine patients for attendance allowance. Of these it is estimated that 82 per cent. are principals in general practice and 16 per cent. are retired medical practitioners. No information is held on the number of EMPs without other remuneration.

Data on the numbers of EMPs possessing a specialist psychiatric qualification or having post-graduate training in psychiatry are not routinely recorded; and to obtain such information would incur a disproportionate cost.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many medical practitioners, annually, are discharged from their responsibilities for assessing for attendance allowance, because of their incompetence in obtaining psychiatric histories or undertaking mental state examinations.

Mr. Scott: No central record is kept of the reasons for discontinuing the services of examining medical practioners for attendance allowance. Doctors are carefully chosen before starting this work. They are given instruction in the requirements for the examinations, their work is monitored and any further training required is given. It is very rare therefore for these doctors' services to be discontinued because of incompetence.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what specific instructions are given in the form of guidelines, in the obtaining of a psychiatric history or examination of mental state;

(2) what training in the eliciting of a psychiatric history or in mental state examination is provided by the Department to practitioners prior to or consequent upon their appointment to assess patients for attendance allowance.

Mr. Scott: Doctors selected to examine attendance allowance claimants are usually recruited from among general practitioners within the locality who will have demonstrable knowledge of local socio-economic conditions, established experience in general medical practice and evident expertise in conducting medical examinations. Guidance is given by the regional office senior medical officer (ROSMO), or regional office medical officer (ROMO), on the background of, and conditions for the award of attendance allowance.

The performance of new examining doctors is closely monitored by the ROSMO who will institute further training sessions as appropriate; thereafter doctors' reports are regularly monitored to identify any further need for guidance. The form, nature and pattern of such monitoring may vary and are dictated by the individual ROSMO.

In conducting an examination for attendance allowance purposes the examining doctor's principal role is to complete the standard report form which has been designed to give an account of the patient's needs for attention and/or supervision. By their very nature the medical examinations required for the purpose of determining eligibility for these allowances need the expertise and experience possessed by general medical practitioners who are able to give consistent advice across a wide range of disabilities and age-groups. In the small number of cases where a specialist opinion is required an independent report is sought from a consultant clinician with the necessary specialist knowledge. The attendance allowance board or its delegate has access not only to the examining doctor's report but other evidence considered necessary, such as psychological, head teacher's and hospital's reports etc. The present arrangements thus allow for suitably qualified persons to be approached, as necessary, in an individual case.

The attendance allowance board has also issued a "Handbook For Delegated Medical Practitioners" a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library. That handbook, together with the written guidelines given to examining medical practitioners upon appointment, describe the medical factors which should be taken into account in the obtaining of a psychiatric history from, and examination of mental state of, those claimants who exhibit mental disorders. As with physical illness, neither the diagnosis nor the disability is the determining criterion in the assessment for attendance allowance. The attendance needs are the determining factor.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what system there is for checking independently, by a medical practitioner with psychiatric experience, that assessments for attendance allowance have been carried out competently.

Mr. Scott: All reports of medical examinations conducted on claimants for attendance allowance are scrutinised either by the attendance allowance board or by the independent medical practitioners to whom the board has delegated its powers to make decisions in individual cases. The board, one of whose members is a consultant psychiatrist, recognises that the assessment of the amount of attention and/or supervision required by patients suffering from psychiatric illnesses may pose particular problems. Guidance has been issued by the board in the "Handbook for Delegated Medical Practitioners", published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in 1988. Aided by the board's guidelines and possessing expertise and experience in the practice of clinical medicine and in the evaluation of medical reports on claimants for attendance allowance, the board's delegated doctors provide an expert and efficient check that attendance allowance assessments are carried out competently.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will show for England, Wales, Scotland and Great Britain his latest estimates of (a) the rate rebate caseload, (b) the cost of rate rebates, (c) the community charge benefit caseload, (d) the number of individuals likely to claim and receive community charge rebates and (e) the cost of community charge rebates.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The most recent estimates for 1989-90 show that the rate rebate caseload in Great Britain (including the community charge rebate in Scotland) will be about 5½ million, and the total benefit cost (including the cost of community charge rebate in Scotland) will be £1·53 billion.

I will write to the hon. Member in due course about the remainder of his question.

Social Security Statistics

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the value of the retirement pension for a single person and a married couple as a proportion of average net earnings for all males and all male manual workers for each year between November 1978 and the latest date available.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is as follows:

Basic state pension as a percentage of average net earnings

Uprating date	Male manual workers		All males
	Single	Couple	Single	Couple
November 1978	32·3	48·9	29·8	45·3
November 1979	31·8	48·4	29·2	44·6
November 1980	32·8	49·7	29·1	44·4
November 1981	33·4	50·9	29·3	44·9
November 1982	35·0	53·1	30·6	46·7
November 1983	33·1	49·7	28·7	43·6
November 1984	32·9	49·6	28·4	43·2

Source: Abstract of statistics, published by DSS August 1989.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the value of unemployment benefit for a single person, a married couple and a married couple with two children under 11 years as a proportion of average net earnings for all males and all male manual workers for each year between November 1978 and the latest date available.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is published in tables 6.1a and 6.1b of the August 1989 edition of the "Abstract of Statistics for Index of Retail Prices, Average Earnings, Social Security Benefits and Contributions", a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the value of income support in 1989-90 for (a) a single person aged under 25 years, (b) a single person aged over 25 years, (c) a married couple, (d) a one-parent family, (e) a married couple with two children aged four years and six years, (f) a pensioner couple aged 65 years and (g) a disabled person with entitlement to disability premium as a proportion of average net earnings for all males and male manual workers.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information on categories (a), (b), (c) and (e) is at tables 6.5a and 6.5b of the August 1989 edition of the "Abstract of Statistics for Index of Retail Prices, Average Earnings, Social Security Benefits and Contributions", a copy of which is in the Library. The information requested for the remaining categories is as follows:

	Income support as a percentage of average net earnings
	All males	Manual Males
(d) (One parent family with one child under age 11)	27·8	33·0
(f)	36·3	43·4
(g)	25·5	30·8

War Widows

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many letters he has received from right hon. and hon. Members over the last six months concerning pension provision for war widows; and how many of these letters were from the hon. Member for Macclesfield.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Since 1 April, we have received 253 letters concerning war widows pensions, 187 of which were from the honourable Member for Macclesfield.

ACC, Livingston

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the contract with Electronic Data Systems for the Livingston area computer centre provides for existing staff of his Department to be considered for employment with EDS; and what safeguards are proposed for the existing terms and conditions of any staff so transferred and for recognition of negotiating rights.

Mr. Newton: Details of the new jobs were circulated to the staff of the existing unemployment benefit computer centre in the other half of Buchanan house and no bar was placed in the way of their applications. Staff who choose to accept offers from Electronic Data Systems (EDS) will resign from the Civil Service and accrued rights will be treated in the normal way for resignations. The terms, conditions and negotiation rights offered by EDS are a matter for the company.

Child Benefit

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of raising child benefit in April 1990 in line with the projection of the retail prices index between December 1988 and September 1989.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The index of retail prices (RPI) increased by 5·7 per cent. between December 1988 and September 1989. The net cost of increasing child benefit by 5·7 per cent. would be around £200 million.

Social Fund

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the 1989-90 social fund allocation for each London local office and the monthly rate of expenditure for (a) grants, (b) loans and (c) community care groups; what additional resources he has made available to each office; and what are his projections for 1990-91.

Mr. Scott: Details of social fund allocations to local offices together with details of their monthly expenditure on grants and loans are available in the Library. Information on expenditure in relation to client groups for all London local offices can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Additional social fund loan allocations for 1989-90 have been made from the contingency reserve to five local offices in London to take account of the unforeseen additional expenditure arising from the arrival of Kurdish refugees in the areas covered by those offices. The revised annual loan allocations are as follows:

	Revised allocation £	Amount of increase £
Highgate	419,845	28,226
Shoreditch	352,401	9,867
Stoke Newington	325,467	16,791
Tottenham	534,260	93,881
Wood Green	220,424	18,991

An announcement on the local office allocations for 1990-91 will be made nearer the time.

Maintenance Payments

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about changing the system of maintenance payments by deducting the sums due from earnings at the same time as income tax and national insurance, enabling these payments to be made direct to the recipients; whether he has any estimates of the reduction of dependency on income support such a system would produce; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: We have received no representations on this point although I am aware that it has been suggested by various organisations and commentators. Absent fathers have a legal responsibility towards their families but, for three quarters of lone parents receiving income support, the absent parent pays no maintenance at all. When courts make maintenance orders they take into account, amongst other things, the means of both parents and therefore the ability of the non-custodial parent to pay maintenance. In certain cases where the father fails to make payments ordered by the courts, and this is due to his wilful refusal or culpable neglect, the courts may make an attachment of earnings order. This means that the maintenance payments are paid to the court by the employer. Any increase in the maintenance collected for lone parent families on benefit would certainly reduce their need for benefit. However the extent of this would depend on the levels of maintenance awarded and collected.

Single Parents

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about increasing the earned income allowance for single parents; what estimates he has of the reduction in the numbers of single parents who would receive income support following such an increase in the allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Many representations are received by Government on all aspects of taxation. Reductions in personal taxation like those made by this Government should generally be improving individuals' incentives to work. Whilst it is undoubtedly true that income tax reductions have helped raise the take-home pay of lone parents who choose to work, I know of no evidence suggesting that an increase in the additional personal allowance would substantially reduce the number of lone parent families receiving income support.

Bathgate Local Office

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many short fixed-term temporary staff have been employed by the social security office in Bathgate over any convenient period in the summer of the current year, and for what reasons; and if he will make a statement on the qualifications of such staff.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Prior to 11 September 1989 no temporary staff were employed on a fixed-term contract basis at this office. In the period 11 September to 9 October up to nine such staff were employed at any one time. The recruits were offered fixed-term contracts, rather than permanent positions, in view of the need to reduce staffing levels in 1990 when major computerisation is introduced. Temporary staff on fixed-term contracts are required to have similar qualifications to those employed on a permanent basis.

Benefits

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the changes made to social security benefits since April and those proposed to the end of 1989-90.

Community Care

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recommendations for early action he is giving to local authorities social services departments in the light of the statement and White Paper on community care.

Mr. David Mellor [holding answer 28 July 1989]: We are currently preparing our White Paper on community care. We will then consider the need for further guidance.

Pensions (Qualifying Age)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the cost at current rates of equalising the qualifying age for receipt of basic pension for both sexes at (a) 62 years, (b) 61 years and (c) 60 years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 24 July 1989]: The information is not available in the form requested. The most recent estimates, which are based on 1985-86 benefit rates, are that the approximate net annual cost to public funds of equalising state pension age at 60 years would be £3,000 million.

ENVIRONMENT

Sizewell C Power Station

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received during the recess about the Central Electricity Generating Board applications to build Sizewell C power station in Suffolk.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend has received eight letters and two postcards which were forwarded to the Department of Energy, which has responsibility for this matter, for a repiy.

Environmental Assessments

Mr. Allan Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance his Department has received from the European Commission concerning the environmental assesament of projects being funded by, or the subject of a grant application for, European regional development funds; and if he will place copies of the guidance in the Library.

Mr. Moynihan: All projects funded with grant from the European regional development fund must conform to Community environmental legislation, in particular, the European Community directive (85/337/EEC) on environmental impact assessment. Guidance on how the directive applies to projects in England and Wales which required planning permission is given in DOE circular 15/88 (Welsh Office 23/88) which is available in the Library. Requirements for environmental informaion to be submitted to the Commission are still the subject of discussion among all member states.

Water Authorities (Debt)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside of 24 May, Official Report, column 951, if he will make a further statement concerning the treatment of outstanding debt of the water authorities.

Mr. Howard: Shortly before flotation, we will be writing off the £4·4 billion National Loans Fund debt transferred from the English water authorities to the new English water plcs. This will be replaced with new securities issued to the Government, including new debentures, but mostly in the form of shares to be sold to the public. This substantial capital reconstruction which involves a sizeable cash injection will enable the companies to finance the major investment in the future which we all want to see.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek to amend the Local Government and Housing Bill to include all or any of the safeguards found in the Poll Tax (Restoration of Individual Privacy) Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: No. The existing legislation gives community charge registration officers clearly defined and limited powers to collect information necessary for their statutory functions.

Planning Applications

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions since 1979 a request to call in a planning application from (a) the Nature Conservancy Council and (b) the Countryside Commission has been refused; and if he will list such occasions, together with the reasons for not calling in, and the principal requests received on those occasions from other persons and bodies.

Mr. Moynihan: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Kurdish Asylum Seekers

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from local authorities, local authority associations and hon. Members concerning the needs of Kurdish asylum seekers; what resources he has made available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The Government have received a number of representations about the impact of the recent influx of Turkish asylum-seekers. Housing benefit for which local authorities receive Government subsidy, and income support are payable to individual claimants and help has been provided from the social fund in the form of crisis loans. In addition, the Government are making exceptional payments to voluntary organisations. Ministers are currently considering the representations which have been made for additional assistance to the boroughs.

Waste Paper (Recycling)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make urgent inquiries of the contractor responsible for the removal of House of Commons rubbish as to why quantities of large paper bags, filled with potentially recyclable waste paper, have been removed in bags labelled for burning only; if he will take steps to stop this practice immediately; if he will make available bags labelled recyclable waste paper; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Waste paper from the Palace of Westminster is collected free of charge as "salvage" and the contractor finds it for recycling. The labels on the paper sacks therefore have no significance in practice. It would be wasteful, however, not to use the outstanding supplies of these sacks before changing over to new sacks which will be marked "Recyclable Waste Paper".

Toxic Waste

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has assessed the use of biotechnologically created bacteria to treat poisonous organic toxic wastes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Since 1975 we have been sponsoring research on the use of bacteria to treat difficult wastes, using their natural genetic changes. We are monitoring closely current developments in genetic manipulation.

Environmental Regulation

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department is participating in the international conference on environmental regulation in the European Community held in London on 19 and 20 October.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: An official of the Department will participate in the conference.

Waste Management

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department had any representation at the conference on raising standards in wastes management: future costs and benefits, held at Lancaster university on 21 September; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I represented my right hon. Friend and delivered the opening address at the conference.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department was represented at the fifth European summer school on radioactive waste management, held on 17 to 20 July, at Christ's college, Cambridge.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A principal inspector from Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution delivered a paper to the 1989 European summer school in a personal capacity.

Greenhouse Effect

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what departmental representation there was at the fifth assembly of the International Association of Meteorology and Atmospheric Physics held at Reading university in July and August; and if he will make a statement on the outcome of the assembly in regard to United Kingdom policies on the greenhouse effect.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I addressed the conference during the opening ceremony and a scientist from the Department attended on the first day. The discussions at the conference highlighted the need for further research on the greenhouse effect. The Government are already committed to over £10 million of such research in this financial year and are planning a continuing programme of projects.

PCB Wastes

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what import and disposal authorisation had been granted for the cargoes of PCB wastes sent from Canada in August on the ships Khudozhnik Saryan and the Madezha Obukhoba to the ports of Tilbury and Liverpool.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Imports of hazardous wastes into this country are governed by the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988. These require the waste disposal authority responsible for the facility receiving the waste to give its approval. A copy of the completed consignment note must be sent to the Secretary of State. These do not identify the ship on which any particular consignment is to be carried, but we have no reason to think that these two shipments were not properly notified.

Disposal of wastes is governed by the licensing of facilities by the waste disposal authority under the Control of Pollution Act 1974.

Waste Exports

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what volumes of toxic, hazardous or special wastes have been exported from the United Kingdom in each year since 1979 for treatment and disposal abroad; and to which countries the waste was sent.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Firm information has been available only since the implementation in October 1988 of the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988. These require, inter alia, that before any consignment of hazardous waste is transported to or from this country, the holder of the waste sends a copy of the completed consignment note to the Secretary of State. The Department has received no consignment notes for exports to date.

Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution has no knowledge of any waste being exported before the implementation of the Transfrontier Regulations in 1988.

Nature Reserves

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the progress of his plans for the change of status of national nature reserves.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government have no plans to change the status of national nature reserves. The Nature Conservancy Council is considering how future policy for national nature reserves can continue to be developed in the light of both the council's preliminary report which was published in May this year, and of the Government's proposals to reorganise the Nature Conservancy Council which were announced in July.

Nature Conservancy Council

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement as to his intentions regarding future funding of the Nature Conservancy Council.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government will continue to ensure that the Nature Conservancy Council receives adequate funding to enable its agreed objectives and programmes for conservation work to be met. The Government have secured an increase in real terms of over 150 per cent. in the Nature Conservancy Council's grant since 1979.

EC Water Directives

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what system of checks and inspections is used by the Commission of the European Economic Community in respect of compliance with directives concerning the quality of domestic water supplies; what information is supplied to it by member states on their water undertakings; and what comprehensive publication of performance is published by the Commission.

Mr. Howard: No inspections at first hand are carried out by the Commission to ensure that member states are complying with the drinking water directive. In the United Kingdom the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations made under the Water Act 1989 incorporate the provisions of the directive into national law and set out sampling requirements, the results of which will be made available to the public and to local authorities.

The Commission depends upon information submitted by member states themselves and also investigates complaints on alleged breaches of the directive made by members of the public. We have no knowledge as to information supplied by other member states, but the United Kingdom has always co-operated fully with the Commission. We have recently submitted an overview of the United Kingdom's national programme costing £1·4 billion over the next five years. I am not aware of any comprehensive publication of performance published by the Commission.

Sewers (Vermin Control)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state those provisions of legislation which aspire to future responsibility for control and destruction of vermin in sewers owned by the new water plcs.

Mr. Howard: Under section 67 of the Water Act 1989, the water service companies which have succeeded the water authorities have a general duty to cleanse and maintain their sewers. However, the primary responsibility for controlling vermin continues to rest with local authorities, which have a duty under the Prevention of Damage by Pests Act 1949 to keep their areas free of rats and mice as far as practicable.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the planning inquiry into the east London river crossing bridge section to be reopened; what consideration may be given in the inquiry into alternative designs of bridge or reversion to the original, or other, tunnel proposals; and if he will make a statement concerning this adjourned inquiry.

Mr. Howard: I have written today to the hon. Member. I have also arranged for a copy of an announcement made earlier today to be placed in the Library.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Further and Higher Education

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the planned recurrent grant to be allocated to (a) the universities, (b) the polytechnics and (c) other colleges of further and higher education in each year from 1988-89 to 1991-92, expressing the figures in cash terms and real terms, indexed so that 1988-89 = 100 and assuming constant annual inflation of (i) 5 per cent., (ii) 6 per cent. and (iii) 7 per cent., respectively.

Mr. Jackson: Recurrent grant to universities in Great Britain and for higher education funded by the Polytechnic and Colleges Funding Council in England is as follows for the financial years 1988-89 and 1989-90:

	UFC £ million	PCFC £ million
1988–89 (outturn)	1,586	n/a
1989–90 (estimate)	1,713	1,035

The plans for 1990-91 and 1991-92, which were set out in Chapter 12 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1989-90 to 1991-92" (Cm. 612), are under review in the current public expenditure survey. The Government's assumptions about inflation in future years were set out in Chapter 21 "Supplementary Analysis and Index" (Cm. 621).

It is not possible to estimate the amount of grant aid paid in support of Colleges of further and higher education maintained by local education authorities. Some of their higher education provision will now be funded by the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council. Other further and higher education is supported from local resources and through the block grant received from central Government. That block grant is not hypothecated to individual services and its application is a matter for decision by individual local authorities. The same consideration applies to the expenditure in 1988–89 of those polytechnics and colleges formerly funded by LEAs and now funded by the PCFC.

DEFENCE

Eurogroup Working Groups

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Eurogroup working groups are currently in existence within NATO; and which subjects they are considering.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are five sub-groups within Eurogroup dealing with co-operation in the fields of operational concepts, logistics, communications, military medicine, and training. The USA and Canada also participate in the training sub-group.

Military Forces (Infrastructure)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much has been spent in each of the past 10 years on infrastructure for military forces from NATO common funds; and what proportion was spent in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The details are as follows:

1980	374	12·57
1981	391	21·99
1982	538	15·47
1983	626	23·95
1984	515	15·82
1985	533	17·17
1986	718	10·10
1987	809	13·98
1988	746	14·77

Gibraltar

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the revenue cost in a full year of the garrison in Gibraltar.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The estimated cost of maintaining a garrison in Gibraltar in 1989-90 is £82 million.

NATO (Expenditure)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when were the most recent discussions between European members of NATO and the United States executive branch of Government over expressed United States concern about the proportionate burden of NATO expenditure borne by the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: NATO's Defence Planning Committee published a report last December on "Enhancing Alliance Collective Security—Shared Roles, Risks and Responsibilities in the Alliance". There was further consideration of burden-sharing at the June meeting of the Defence Planning Committee. Discussions within the Alliance are continuing.

Cyprus Bases

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots are employed at each of the sovereign bases in Cyprus.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Some 837 Greek Cypriots are currently employed at the eastern sovereign base area (Dhekelia), and some 1993 at the western sovereign base area (Akrotiri); 322 Turkish Cypriots are employed at Dhekelia.

Prime Minister (Transport)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what charges were directed to the office of the Minister for the Civil Service in respect of providing transport for the Prime Minister in the financial year 1988-89.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence charges the Office of the Minister for the Civil Service for the use of defence facilities at rates which are calculated in accordance with the rules laid down by the Treasury. These rates are designed to ensure that no residual costs are carried on defence votes. During 1988-89, bills to the value of £519,000 were raised on OMCS.

Emergency Parking

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the final cost charged to the Department of Transport in respect of service assistance in providing emergency parking facilities during the recent transport strike.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The bill has not yet been presented to the Department of Transport. I will write to the hon. Member when the final costs have been assessed.

Party Conferences (Security)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total cost and the services provided by his Department for security at the 1989 (a) Labour party conference and (b) Conservative party conference.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In response to requests from the chief constables of the Lancashire and Sussex constabularies, small numbers of military personnel were employed to assist the police in searching the respective conference areas for explosive devices and in potential bomb disposal tasks. No other service assistance was provided at either party conference. In line with normal arrangements, no charges were raised against the respective constabularies. The related costs fell to MOD votes.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Avian Influenza

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what precautions has he taken to control the spread of avian flu among hens in the Republic of Ireland into Northern Ireland; if he is in consultation with the authorities in the Republic of Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 17 October 1989]: The Republic of Ireland authorities have taken precautions necessary to deal with the risk of spread from the two outbreaks of avian influenza in poultry in Co. Monaghan.

Poultry and their products may not be moved from the restricted area in the Republic of Ireland without a licence. They are not eligible for export to Northern Ireland.

Northern Ireland has imposed movement restrictions in the Northern Ireland territory which falls within 10 km of the outbreaks in the Republic of Ireland. The necessary amendments have been made to Northern Ireland specific import licences for live poultry and hatching eggs to prevent the introduction of disease.

The Department of Agriculture, Dublin, has kept us fully informed of the nature and virulence of the outbreaks and the eradication measures taken.

Northern Ireland veterinary and animal health officials have remained in close contact.

The situation is being kept under continuous review.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Alcohol Abuse

55. Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the Director of the Scottish Consumer Council; and if he discussed the problem of alcohol abuse by youngsters under the age of 18.

Mr. Forth: I last met the director of the Scottish Consumer Council when I attended a meeting of the council on 19 May. This topic was not among those that were discussed.

Arms Sales (South Africa)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has or is seeking regarding the involvement of Ferranti subsidiary ISC, or its shell companies, Darlow, Tool Techniques and Varitech in the selling of arms to South Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: It is not our practice to comment on specific arms sales; however, Her Majesty's Government do abide by UN resolution 418 which prohibits the sale of arms to South Africa. Export licence applications under the Export of Goods (Control) Order for such exports would be refused.

THE ARTS

Arts Council (Report)

Mr. Jessel: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he has yet received the report he commissioned from Mr. Richard Wilding about the role of the Arts Council and Regional Arts Association.

Mr. Luce: I have now received the report which I commissioned from Mr. Richard Wilding in December last year about the structure of support for the arts in England.

Mr. Wilding's report is the first major review of the structure and organisation of arts support for many years.

I commissioned the report at a time of major growth and development in the arts and a change in the nature of arts funding by central Government, the private sector and local authorities. I felt it was important that the structure for distributing these funds was still achieving its primary objectives: to create an environment in which the arts in England could flower; and to sustain the confidence of the arts world and the public in the system of distribution of taxpayers' money to the arts.

The report was to examine areas of possible concern: accountability for the public money spent by regional arts associations; lack of coherence between national funding bodies and the RAAs; cumbersome structures for handling business; and the cost of administering the whole system.

Mr. Wilding has now prepared his report, following extensive consultations with the Arts Council, the regional arts associations and other bodies and individuals with an interest in the subsidised arts sector.

I am keen to ensure that everyone who has an interest in the administration of the arts has the opportunity to comment on the proposals which have resulted from this process. That is why I have arranged for publication of the report, copies of which are available on request from my office. I have also arranged for copies to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Wilding has produced a detailed and carefully researched analysis of the current framework for policy making, administration and funding of arts in England. He had identified a number of areas where he thinks there are weaknesses and has proposed specific changes for improvement.

In so doing he has produced a very challenging document which unquestionably provides an invaluable foundation for debate in the arts world. I want that debate to be thorough but I also want to avoid prolonged uncertainty. In view of this, and the extensiveness of Mr. Wilding's own consultations, I propose a limited consultation period and would welcome comments on his recommendations, in writing, before 31 December. I shall want to take these comments fully into account before reaching decisions about Mr. Wilding's recommendations.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Eurotunnel

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if any further proposals to assist in financing the Eurotunnel have been made to the European investment bank since 15 May 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: Discussions between the EIB and its clients are commercially confidential and private.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his reply of 6 November 1987, Official Report, column 899, if the syndicate of banks formed to co-ordinate the financing of Eurotunnel have now agreed to give a guarantee to the European investment bank in respect of the £1,000,000,000 loan given by the Euro bank to the Eurotunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: Yes, sir.

Budget Council

Mr. Couchman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent meeting of the European Community's budget council.

Mr. Ryder: The Budget Council met in Brussels on 28 July. The Paymaster General represented the United Kingdom.

The Council established a first reading draft budget for 1990 totalling 48·19 becu (£30·7 billion) in commitment appropriations and 46·14 becu (£29·4 billion) in payment appropriations, respectively 708·3 mecu (£451·4 million) and 653·3 mecu (£416·4 million) below the figures proposed by the Commission in the preliminary draft budget (PDB).

The 1990 budget is the second to be subject to the arrangements for budgetary discipline arising from the 1988 European Council and the inter-institutional agreement between the Council, the Commission and the European Parliament which incorporates expenditure ceilings for 1988-92. The following table shows that the first reading draft budget is some way within those ceilings:

	Financial mecu	Perspective £ million	Draft mecu	Budget £ million
Commitment appropriation
1. FEOGA guarantee	30,700	19,567	26,522	16,904
2. Structural Funds	11,555	7,365	11,527	7,347
3. R & D and Integrated Mediterranean programmes	2,071	1,320	1,957	1,248
4. Other policies	2,729	1,739	2,500	1,593
5. Reimbursements and administration	4,930	3,142	4,688	2,988
6. Monetary reserve	1,000	637	1,000	637
Total	52,985	33,770	48,194	30,717
Total Payment appropriations[1]	50,791	32,372	46,139	29,407

[1] There is only a global ceiling for payments.

Provision for agricultural guarantee expenditure is about 4,000 mecu (£2,549 million) below the financial guideline calculated in accordance with the Budget Discipline Decision of June 1988. The draft budget also includes provision of 1,470 mecu (£940 million) for the cost of depreciating existing agricultural stocks; and of 1,000 mecu (£637 million) for a monetary reserve which can be drawn up only to cover part of any additional agricultural expenditure arising from change in the $/ecu exchange rate.

Non-obligatory expenditure (DNO) in the draft budget totals 16·3 becu (£10·4 billion) in commitments and 14·2 becu (£9·1 billion) in payments. In accordance with the conclusions of the 1988 February European Council, the Budget Council distinguished between so-called "privileged" and "non-privileged" expenditure. In the first category, the draft budget provides for the substantial increase in appropriations for the structural funds agreed at the February 1988 Council and for research and development appropriations at a level consistent with the framework programme adopted in September 1987. As regards non-privileged DNO, the Budget Council reduced the proposed provision in the PDB by an amount sufficient to ensure that, for this category of expenditure, the growth of both payments and commitments was contained within half the maximum rate of 6·1 per cent. communicated by the Commission.

On 9 October, the ECOFIN Council established an amending letter to the PDB providing for economic restructuring aid to Poland and Hungary totalling 200 mecu. This expenditure is in excess of the relevant ceiling in the financial perspective (line 4 in the table) and, as a temporary device pending the necessary revision of the perspective, the Council agreed to a corresponding negative reserve.

The European Parliament will consider the draft budget at its plenary session in the week beginning 24 October. The Parliament's amendments and modifications will be considered by the Budget Council on 14 November.

VAT Rebates (Farmers)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning applications for value added tax rebates for expenditure not eligible for grants made available to farmers practising low-impact conservation husbandry; and if he will consider varying such eligibility.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 17 October 1989]: None.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library the standing arrangements made by her Majesty's Government for the employment of, or making contracts with, advertising agencies; and what advice, instructions and directions have been given to (a) regional water authorities and (b) the Central Electricity Generating Board in respect of similar activities.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 17 October 1989]: At all times the Government aim to obtain best value for money when selecting advisers and contractors. Contracts with advertising agencies for Government advertising campaigns are handled and placed by the Central Office of Information, which is advised by the Advisory Committee on Advertising. The advertising arrangements of the water authorities and the CEGB are matters for the industries themselves.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Football Hooliganism (Neo-Nazi Groups)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many incidents of football hooliganism investigated for each year since 1979 involved direct or indirect organised and planned activities by racist or neo-Nazi groups;

(2) how many police forces in England, Scotland and Wales are at present investigating the racial and neo-Nazi connotations of football hooliganism; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This information is not recorded centrally.

Metropolitan Police (Suspensions)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many metropolitan police officers have been suspended from duty pending investigation of alleged misconduct to date in 1989.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that 64 officers from that force have been suspended from duty so far this year.

Metropolitan Police Helicopters

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis as to for what purpose the Metropolitan police helicopter was deployed in Forest Gate at around 7.30 pm on 2 August; and on how many occasions in the last 12 months helicopters have been used by the police in Newham;

(2) if he will provide a breakdown by (a) London borough and (b) number of occasions on which the Metropolitan police have summoned the assistance of a helicopter in the last 12 months.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that at approximately 7.30 pm on 2 August the helicopter was deployed on two occasions. The first was to locate suspects in the grounds of the Gateway store and the second was to assist police who were in pursuit of a suspect car.

Between 1 October 1988 and 30 September 1989, the helicopter was used on 4,277 occasions. Information about its use by police in individual London boroughs could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what form information is kept in his Department regarding experiments on animals carried out by contractors working on behalf of the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Home Office collects information about all licensees and their work, but not about funding bodies which may be supporting this work.

Metropolitan Police (Traffic Strategy)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has regarding the overall force traffic strategy prepared by the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand that the Metropolitan police have for some time now, been working towards the formulation of a new strategic approach to traffic. I understand that this work is nearing completion.

Party Conferences (Security)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the total costs to public funds arising out of security measures provided by the various police forces at the 1989 (a) Labour party conference, (b) Conservative party conference, (c) SLD conference, (d) SDP conference and (e) Green party conference.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief officers of the forces concerned that the additional cost of policing the 1989 party conferences were estimated as follows:

Conference	Force	Additional cost £
Labour	Sussex	4,000
Conservative	Lancashire	1,080,000
Social and Liberal Democrats	Sussex	600
Social Democratic Party	North Yorkshire	None
Green Party	West Midlands	None

The level of resources provided for the policing of party conferences is an operational matter for the chief officer of police in the light of all circumstances, including an assessment of the threat of terrorist attack.

Television Violence

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether ethnic groups have contacted him about levels of violence on television.

Mr. Renton: We receive a number of letters about violence portrayed on television, but have not received any specifically from ethnic groups.

Independent Television (Scotland)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met representatives of independent television companies in Scotland; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Renton: I visited the Scottish independent television companies on 27 and 28 February, when a wide range of broadcasting issues was discussed. I have also met their representatives on other occasions during discussions on the future of broadcasting.

Arrests (Football Grounds)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to how many of those arrested at football grounds during the 1987-88 season were subsequently (a) tried and (b) convicted.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information about the outcome of the 6,106 arrests made at Football League matches during the 1987-88 season is not recorded centrally.

Serious Crimes Squad (West Midlands)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to how many officers were serving with the serious crimes squad at the time it was disbanded.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief constable that there were 29 officers serving with the squad at the time that it was disbanded in August 1989.

Dispersal Prisons (Costs)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the current cost per inmate per week in each dispersal prison.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The average cost per inmate per week in each dispersal prison in 1988-89 (the most recent year for which information is available) was:

Albany	586
Frankland	533
Full Sutton	742
Gartree	555
Long Lartin	505
Parkhurst	829
Wakefield	365

Police Manpower

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the increase in police manpower since 1979.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: At the end of July this year, police manpower stood at a record level of 169,022, made up of 125,808 police officers and 43,214 civilian staff. These figures represent a gain of 14,315 police officers and 8,584 civilians under this government since May 1979.

My right hon. Friend will be able to approve a further 1,100 police posts for 1990-91 so that police numbers will continue to grow.

Random Breath Testing

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many replies he has received to his request for opinions from the public on the introduction of random breath testing; and how many responses were in favour of this proposal.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) on 8 May 1989 at column 284.

ENERGY

Plutonium

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last discussed the issue of plutonium-contaminated waste with the chairman of the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not met the chairman of the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee. RWMAC advises my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment, Scotland and Wales, with whom policy responsibility for radioactive waste management matters lies.

Alternative Energy

Mr. Wray To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is for each year since 1979 the amount of public funds spent on research on energy produced by (a) off-shore wind turbines, (b) wave and tidal power, (c) solar technology and (d) other kinds of alternatives to coal, oil and nuclear energy.

Mr. Peter Morriso he table sets out expenditure on renewable sources o rgy supported by public funds since 1979. Information on expenditure on offshore wind R and D is included in the totals for wind R and D. Total expenditure on offshore wind since 1979 is £1·07 million (Department of Energy and CEGB).

Public sector R, D and D expenditure on renewable energy (£ million)

[1] Includes expenditure on "waste as a fuel" projects under the Energy Efficiency Office Demonstration Scheme.

Notes:
1. The table incorporates expenditure on renewable energy by Government Departments. Science Engineering Research Council, Natural Environment Research Council and the CEGB.
2. Up to 1986-87 total for R and D also includes expenditure on low head hydro and general studies to 1986-87. These are separately identified for 1987-88 and include work carried out by the Chief Scientist Group, ETSU.
3. The totals for solar energy incorporate work on passive solar design of buildings, active solar water heating and photovoltaics.
4. The totals for wave incorporate work on ocean thermal energy conversion.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to implement the Central Electricity Generating Board scientific report on energy produced by wind turbines based off-shore.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I am not aware of the report to which the hon. Member refers. My Department is continuing to investigate the technical and economic feasibility of offshore wind energy.

Energy Saving

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what research his Department is carrying out or sponsoring in order to improve energy saving techniques.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Research under the "energy efficiency best practice" programme is directed to four interrelated elements: compilation of "energy consumption guides" giving data on energy use so consumers can compare their performance with others in their sector; provision of "good practice guides" promoting proven techniques which are already enabling the better energy users to be more efficient; production of "new practice" case studies on first commercial applications of new energy efficiency techniques, to promote wider implementation; support for "future practice" pre-competitive research and development work on a joint venture basis.

PRIME MINISTER

Official Visits

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will state for the period since 29 July (a) the countries she visited officially, (b) how many civil servants accompanied her, (c) the total cost involved, (d) the method of travel and (e) the number of journalists who used official transportation.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

Since 29 July, the Prime Minister has visited Japan and Moscow. She was accompanied by 12 civil servants, plus a further two for the Moscow leg. Transport was provided by an RAF VC10 and 18 representatives of the media travelled with her. Information on costs for the visit is not yet available.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister what action has been taken by her Department to recover outstanding moneys from media organisations arising from their representatives accompanying her on overseas visits.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is satisfied that the arrangements used by her office for expediting the payment of overdue invoices are effective.

Policy Unit

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total cost in 1988-89 of the Prime Minister's policy unit.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The cost in 1988-89 of the Prime Minister's policy unit was £351,832.

No. 10 Downing Street

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total cost of (a) decoration and (b) furnishings in No. 10 Downing street during 1988-89; and what are the estimated totals for 1989-90.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The total cost in 1988-89 for decorations and furnishings for 10 Downing street was £391,125. The estimated cost of similar works over 1989-90 is £606,313.

The current works relate to the rooms used for state and public occasions; and reflect the costs necessary to refurbish part of one of the country's historic buildings, which had not been refurbished for nearly 20 years.

TRANSPORT

Eurotunnel

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a further statement on the arrangements for financing Eurotunnel insofar as they fall within his responsibility.

Mr. Portillo: Responsibility for Channel tunnel financing arrangements is entirely a matter for Eurotunnel.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on measures to ensure security in the Eurotunnel, and arrangements to identify explosives in any vehicle.

Mr. Portillo: The Government take very seriously the need to protect the tunnel and those who will use it. A security check regime will be required. It would not be appropriate for me to make a statement on the details of the security arrangements.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he anticipates that Eurotunnel will be open to traffic.

Mr. Portillo: I understand that Eurotunnel's projected opening date is 15 June 1993.

Air Controls

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to improve the present controls system which the Association of European Airlines report found to be fragmented, costly and inefficient.

Mr. McLoughlin: Over the last year, the United Kingdom has successfully promoted a series of practical initiatives to improve co-operation and coordination between air traffic control authorities in Europe. The European Civil Aviation Conference recently established a task force to examine the scope for further integration of air traffic control systems. The task force's recommendation will be considered by European Transport Ministers early next year.

Merchant Fleet

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is for each year since 1979 (a) the tonnage capacity of the British merchant fleet and (b) the number of the British merchant ships.

Mr. McLoughlin: The number and tonnage of trading vessels registered in the United Kingdom, Crown dependencies and dependent territories at 1 July in each year since 1979 is as follow:

Trading vessels registered in the United Kingdom, Crown Dependencies and the Dependent Territories: 1979-89

Notes:

1. Vessels registered in the Crown Dependencies during 1979, 1980 and 1981 are included in the United Kingdom statistics for those years.
2. 'Grt' stands for 'Gross Registered Tonnage'.
3. 'Dwt' stands for 'Deadweight tonnage'.
4. The Crown Dependencies include the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands.
5. The main Dependent Territories' registers are Gibraltar, Bermuda and the Cayman Islands.
6. The figures exclude non-trading type vessels such as tugs, off-shore supply ships and fishing vessels.

Marchioness

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the Government's contribution to the disaster fund set up by the mayor of Southwark for the victims of the Marchioness disaster and their families.

Mr. McLoughlin: Following the Marchioness disaster, the Government made a contribution of £125,000 to the river boat disaster fund. Neither the fund nor the Government's contribution to it will affect any possible claims for compensation.

Parliamentary approval for this payment will be sought in a supplementary supply estimate for the administration and transport services vote. Pending that approval, the £125,000 donation has been met from a repayable advance from the Contingencies Fund. As savings have occurred in class VIII, 2, there will be no increase in the public expenditure planning total.

Dock Workers (Redundancies)

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many former registered dock workers have been made redundant since the abolition of the dock labour scheme; how much the Government have contributed towards the redundancy payments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: As at 13 October, 3,938 former registered dock workers had been made redundant out of 9,221 on the register when the Scheme was abolished on 3 July. In accordance with the provision of the Dock Work (Compensation Payments Scheme) Regulations 1989, the Department has contributed £78,760,050 towards the redundancy compensation payments. It is estimated that further payments will bring the total in 1989-90 to about £90 million.

Provision of £10 million was made in the summer supplementary estimate on class VIII, vote 3, and I shall be seeking parliamentary approval of a winter supplementary estimate on that Vote of a further £80 million for the compensation scheme.

The number of redundancies is far higher than had been expected, but clearly demonstrates that the overmanning in ports under the dock labour scheme was greater than had been realised. A major improvement in the efficiency of working methods in the ports is now taking place.

Sir Keith Bright

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether discussions on the terms on which Sir Keith Bright departed from London Regional Transport have now been concluded.

Mr. Parkinson: Yes. After due consideration of a claim made by Sir Keith Bright, I have determined that London Regional Transport shall pay to him the sum of £34,000 in settlement of the matter.

Tunnel Services

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the users of the tunnel lids over the M25 at Bell Common, Epping and Holmesdale, Enfield and the A1(M) at Hatfield pay for the maintenance of the tunnel services in the form of a rent or lump sum up front.

Mr. Atkins: The Department of Transport bears the whole cost of maintaining and servicing all three tunnels. There are no commercial uses of the M25 tunnel lids.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Organic Farming

Mr. Wray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has for each year since 1979 on the amount of organic food produced in (a) Canada, (b) Denmark, (c) France, (d) the Federal Republic of Germany, (e) Holland, (f) Sweden and (g) the United States of America.

Mr. Maclean: This information is not available.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, what is the amount of (a) private and (b) public funds spent on research about organic farming for each year since 1979.

Mr. Maclean: Information on the amount of public funds spent on research about organic farming for this year was given in the reply to the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) on 18 May at col. 300. Information for earlier years can be produced only at disproportionate cost. Information on the amount of private funds spent on organic farming is not available.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any plans to support and promote organic farming.

Mr. Maclean: The Government are already encouraging British farmers in various ways to respond to consumer demand for organic produce. My Department was instrumental in setting up the United Kingdom register of organic food standards to produce national organic standards and an independent certification and inspection scheme. UKROFS is now well advanced in its work. The fallow option of the set-aside scheme enables farmers to prepare their land for organic production without forgoing income entirely. Similar support is being considered under the forthcoming extensification scheme. The farm and conservation grant scheme, co-operative sector assistance and ADAS advice are all available to organic producers. My department's R & D activities are also relevant to organic farming as is the recently announced comprehensive economic survey of organic farming which we are funding.

Conservation Husbandry

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those grants now available to farmers practising low-input conservation husbandry.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 17 October 1989]: The full range of Government grants is available to those farmers pursuing less intensive husbandry systems with an emphasis on good conservation practice. Some are likely to match their more specific needs. For example, farmers who wish to convert to organic farming can take advantage of the fallow provisions of the set-aside scheme which enable them to prepare their land to meet organic standards without foregoing income entirely. Under the agricultural and horticultural co-operation schemes grant aid may be available towards formation and marketing costs of co-operatives formed to market organic produce or other foods produced under low input systems. Capital grants may also be available to established co-operatives towards the cost of buildings and equipment. In addition, incentives to protect and improve the environment exist under schemes such as the farm and conservation grant scheme, the environmentally sensitive areas scheme and the farm woodland scheme. Further assistance to less intensive farming under the options of the extensification scheme is under consideration.

Synthetic Chemicals

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) of 27 July, Official Report, column 961, if he will make a statement on his detailed consultation with the United Kingdom Register of Organic Foodstuffs Board on synthetic chemicals.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 17 October 1989]: The reply of 27 July at column 961 referred to detailed consultations with the board of the United Kingdom register of organic food standards and other bodies representing the producers, processors, manufacturers and consumers of organic foods when the European Commission's proposals on organic agriculture are submitted to the Council of Agriculture Ministers. These proposals have not yet been submitted by the Commission.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Amess: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list those Select Committee reports which have been debated on the floor of the House in each Session since 1966.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The information requested is as follows:

Notes:

Statistics relating to reports of Select Committees referred to on the Order Paper for Sessions 1965-66 to 1978-79 inclusive are not readily available; the following list therefore only covers Session 1979-80 onwards. Prior to 1979 the practice of "tagging" debates when Select Committee reports were relevant was less frequently used. Practice also changed following the repeal of the Standing Order relating to Business of Supply on 19 July 1982 and its replacement by a new Standing Order relating to Consideration of Estimates, with effect from the following Session. Full information relating to the current Session will appear in the Sessional Return.

In addition there have often been debates (notably in respect of procedure, or the working of the House, but also on other matters) where reports of Select Committees have been relevant to, or mentioned in, the debate but have not been referred to on the Order Paper.

Security Passes

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many Commons pass applications have been received during the summer recess in respect of overseas students working for Members; how many are still awaiting security clearance; what is the average time taken to process such applications.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I understand that 42 pass applications were received during the summer recess in respect of Members' temporary research assistants from overseas, 33 of which are still awaiting clearance. In response to the comments made by the Services Committee in paragraph 11 of its second report, 1987-88, and the House's approval of that report on 30 January this year, new procedures have been introduced for the clearance of all overseas nationals applying for Palace of Westminster photo-identity passes. All the sponsoring organisations were warned in writing by the authorities of the House on 20 June that ample time should in future be allowed for the clearance of such applications. They were also told that it was not possible to be precise on how long the procedures would take but that, at least initially, two months should be allowed for the applications to be processed.

I regret that right hon. and hon. Members may be inconvenienced because the clearances have not yet been received, but the sponsoring organisations failed in the main to heed the warnings they were given. The Pass Office did not receive some of the completed application forms until September. I can assure the House that everything possible is being done to expedite clearance procedures; but timely submission of applications will remain essential if similar inconvenience is to be avoided in future.

Norman Shaw Buildings

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Lord President of the Council if, in view of the new security requirement that visitors to the Norman Shaw parliamentary office buildings shall use the Derby gate entrance rather than that from the Embankment, he will arrange with Westminster council, the Metropolitan police and the contractors working on the building adjoining Whitehall, to have this area cleaned and tidied and made more presentable for the reception of visitors.

Sir Geoffrey Howe [holding answer 17 October 1989]: The area outside Derby gate is not a matter directly for me. However, I have asked the relevant House authorities to take up the question of its cleanliness and tidyness with Westminister city council and the contractors working on the phase 1 site of the new parliamentary buildings.

EMPLOYMENT

Employment Training

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the present health and safety standards in the employment training programme.

Mr. Nicholls: Health and safety statistics on employment training do not yet enable a close analysis to be undertaken. They will be kept under close review, and adjustments on employment training health and safety arrangements will be made as necessary in the light of emerging experience.

HEALTH

Rats and Cockroaches

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what urgent measures he is taking to combat dangers to public health posed by rats and cockroaches.

Mr. Freeman: Local authorities rather than health authorities are responsible under the Prevention of Damage by Pests Act 1949 for ensuring, as far as is practicable, that their areas are kept free of rats and mice.

In respect of food premises, the Food Hygiene (General) Regulations 1970 which are enforced by local authorities, require the prevention, so far as is reasonable practicable, of any risk of infestation by rats, mice or insects.

Private Health Care

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action his Department is taking to protect the public from expensive and unreliable private health check-ups.

Mr. Freeman: The General Medical Council is responsible for the maintenance of ethical standards in the medical profession.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the present regulations regarding (a) the establishment and implications of private clinics and (b) controls to ensure that the staff of those clinics are properly qualified for the functions they are called upon to perform.

Mr. Freeman: In England and Wales part II of the Registered Homes Act 1984 and its associated regulations require that relevant premises are registered and inspected at least twice a year, that the person in charge is appropriately qualified and that adequate professional, technical, ancillary and other staff are provided. In Scotland the corresponding legislation is the Nursing Homes Registration (Scotland) Act 1938 and the associated regulations. Neither Act contains powers to control health screening clinics.

Ambulance Staff

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is for each year since 1974 the number of National Health Service ambulance staff.

Mr. Mellor: The information is given in the table. Most of the increase shown for ambulance men and women represent qualified staff.

National Health Service staff in post in England—at 30 September each year — Whole-time equivalent[1]

NHS (Pay)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is for each year since 1979 the average pay increase for National Health Service (a) ambulance staff, (b) nurses, (c) doctors and (d) health board managers.

Mr. Mellor: Average pay settlements are given in the table.

Year (1 August to 31 July)	Percentage pay settlement
	Ambulance staff[1]	Nurses and midwives	Doctors and dentists	General managers[2]
1979-80	39·0	37·9	31·4	—

[5] Staged award; final part paid with effect from 1 February 1986.
[6] In addition the standard working week was reduced by one hour.

Under-fives Provision

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) at what intervals the inter-departmental consultative group on provision for under-fives meets;

(2) if he will list the membership of the inter-departmental group on provision for under-fives.

Mr. Mellor: The inter-departmental consultative group meets once a year or more frequently if appropriate.

The following Government Departments and outside organisations are represented on the group:

Department of Health
Department of Education and Science
Department of Social Security
Department of Employment
Department of the Environment
Ministry of Defence
Home Office
Cabinet Office
Welsh Office
Scottish Office
Association of County Councils
Association of Metropolitan Authorities
National Council for Voluntary Child Care Organisations
Voluntary Organisations Liaisons Council for Under Fives
Under Fives Unit of the National Children's Bureau
Commission for Racial Equality

Representatives of other organisations may be invited if there are relevant agenda items.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SF(J) Circulars

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the purpose of SF(J) circulars and whether he will place copies of them in the Library.

Mr. Scott: The main purpose of SF(J) circulars is to provide local office staff with administrative instructions relating to matters of financial control and security. It is therefore not departmental practice to make them publicly available.

Community Care Grants

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many young persons in Glasgow have been given community care grants in the past six months; and how many applicants were refused.

Mr. Scott: This information is not collected.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing for each office of his Department in Glasgow the amount per month disbursed in (a) budget loans and (b) community care grants, in each month since these payments came into operation.

Mr. Scott: Details of this expenditure are available in the Library.

Funerals

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the national average amount paid in social fund funeral grants.

Mr. Scott: The average social fund funeral payment for the period April to August 1989 was £525.

Social Fund

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in (a) Glasgow and (b) the Provan constituency were refused loans by officers of the social fund on the grounds that the applicants lacked sufficient income to repay such loans.

Mr. Scott: For the 13 offices in metropolitan Glasgow, during the five-month period ending 30 September 1989, 727 applications for budgeting loans and 100 applications for crisis loans were refused on the grounds of the applicant being unable to repay. This is equivalent to 2·2 per cent. and 0·7 per cent. respectively of the number of applications processed.

In the Provan local office, there were 43 such refusals for budgeting loans and one for a crisis loan. This is equivalent to 1·1 per cent. and 0·1 per cent. respectively of the number of applications processed.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in the constituency of Glasgow, Provan have applied for (a) grants and (b) loans from the social fund since its inception.

Mr. Scott: Information about the number of people who make applications to the social fund is not collected.

Information about the numbers of applications processed is placed in the library.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many social fund applications remained unprocessed in Newham Department of Social Security offices at the end of financial year 1988-89; how many are currently awaiting determination; and what was the underspend at each office in 1988-89.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is shown in the table. For the financial year to date, each of the offices is on target to make full use of its budget allocations.

Plaistow ILO:
Loans allocation remaining at 31 March 1989—13·3 per cent.
Grants allocation remaining at 31 March 1989—38·8 per cent.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH

European Community

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to meet his French opposite number to discuss European Community matters.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs expects to meet Mr. Dumas again at the Foreign Affairs Council on 6-7 November.

Hong Kong

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what specific judicial procedures will be used after July 1997 to resolve any disputes between the United Kingdom and the People's Republic of China over the implementation or interpretation of the joint agreement on the future of Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: The Sino-British joint declaration is an internationally binding agreement registered by both Governments with the United Nations. The primary means for discussing the implementation of the joint declaration, and for solving differences, is the Joint Liaison Group which will continue in being until the year 2000. The joint declaration stipulates that matters on which there is disagreement in the Joint Liaison Group shall be referred to the two Governments for solution through consultations. Should disputes nevertheless arise between the Governments, it would be open to the British Government of the day to make use of any channels, or judicial procedures, which might be available and appropriate in the circumstances.

Human Rights

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many regional treaties similar to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms are now in existence; and which regions do they cover.

Mr. Sainsbury: There are two other major regional treaties. The American convention on human rights entered into force in 1978 and is interpreted and applied by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and (in the case of those States Parties which have recognised its jurisdiction) the Inter-American Court of Human Rights. States parties to the convention are from the Latin American and Caribbean regions. The African charter on human and peoples' rights came into force in 1986 and is interpreted and applied by the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights. It is open to members of the Organisation of African Unity.

Civil and Political Rights

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the present status of the optional protocol to the international covenant on civil and political rights.

Mr. Sainsbury: The United Nations General Assembly adopted the optional protocol to the international covenant on civil and political rights on 16 December 1966. It was opened for signature on 19 December 1966 and entered into force on 23 March 1976. As at 1 August 1989, 45 states had ratified or acceded to the optional protocol.

International Court of Justice

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs who are the present members and what is their nationality, of the International Court of Justice; what salaries they are paid; what is the total cost of servicing the court; and if he will estimate the United Kingdom share of contribution to that expenditure.

Mr. Sainsbury: The present members of the International Court of Justice are:

José Maria Ruda (Argentina)
Kéba Mbaye (Senegal)
Manfred Lachs (Poland)
Taslim Olawale Elias (Nigeria)
Shigeru Oda (Japan)
Roberto Ago (Italy)
Stephen M. Schwebel (USA)
Sir Robert Jennings (United Kingdom)
Mohammed Bedjaoui (Algeria)
Ni Zhengyu (China)
Jens Evensen (Norway)
Nikolai K. Tarassov (USSR)
Gilbert Guillaume (France)
Mohammed Shahabuddeen (Guyana)
Raghunandan Swarup Pathak (India)

The annual salary of each judge is US $82,000. The budget of the ICJ for the biennium 1988-89 is US $13,250,800.

The United Kingdom pays $643,989 of this.

Guatemala

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when Her Majesty's ambassador last met members of the Commission for Human Rights of Guatemala, and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Sainsbury: Her Majesty's ambassador has not received any request to meet members of the commission. Its leaders are not resident in Guatemala. Two of them met FCO officials in London in March 1989. They discussed the human rights situation in Guatemala.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last made representations concerning violations of human rights to the Government of Guatemala.

Mr. Sainsbury: The then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs expressed to Guatemalan Ministers concern about the human rights situation in Guatemala during his visit there in March 1989. The Guatemalan Government are aware, from more recent contacts, of our continuing concern.

Endangered Species

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of the sale by tender by the Hong Kong authorities of confiscated items permitted for commercial trade under the Convention on Trade in Endangered Species; what items were sold; to whom they were sold; and what amount was raised in each case.

Mr. Maude: There has been no sale by tender of confiscated items permitted for commercial trade under CITES since February 1988. A sale by tender, planned for January 1989, was cancelled.

Ivory

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current estimate of elephant ivory held by the Hong Kong authorities as a result of seizures and detentions.

Mr. Maude: Two thousand one hundred and ninety-two kilogrammes of ivory are held by the Hong Kong authorities as a result of seizures and detentions.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current estimate of elephant ivory held in Hong Kong; and what proposals are being considered for its disposal.

Mr. Maude: The current estimated stock of elephant ivory in Hong Kong is 670 tonnes, consisting of 500 tonnes of raw and 170 tonnes of worked ivory. It is privately owned in Hong Kong. Its disposal is currently under consideration at the CITES conference.

Whale Meat

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the country of origin of the 0·4 kg of whale meat seized in Hong Kong restaurant raids during the first six months of 1989.

Mr. Maude: The 0·4 kg of whale meat seized was claimed to have been imported from Japan.

Select Committee Report

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to respond to the report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs on Foreign and Commonwealth Office/Overseas Development Administration Expenditure 1989-90.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Government's response to the Select Committee report will be published today in the form of a Command Paper.

Boat People

Mr. Wolfson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contribution the Government have made towards the cost of providing emergency accommodation for the Vietnamese boat people in Hong Kong.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have contributed £4·5 million for this purpose. Parliamentary approval for this new service will be sought in a supplementary supply estimate for the vote for other external relations (class II, vote 2). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure of £4·5 million was met by a repayable advance from the Contingencies Fund in August.

Poland

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what provision the Government is making to provide money following the Prime Minister's announcement of the creation of a "know how" fund for Poland.

Mr. Waldegrave: The £25 million as announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is to be given over a period of five years. We estimate that the immediate costs of providing the type of training and advice the know how fund was created for will be £1·3 million. Parliamentary approval for these services will be sought in a supplementary supply estimate for the vote for other external relations (class II, vote 2). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure of £1·3 million is to be met by a repayable advance from the Contingencies Fund.

The know how fund is now getting into full swing, with more than 40 projects agreed or in the pipeline. These range from a seminar for Parliamentarians and training attachments for journalists to a conference on privatisation and a series of management training projects. At the same time the ground work is being laid for more wide-ranging assistance in the banking, financial services and industrial sectors. We believe that assistance of this kind will play a crucial role in the development of democracy and a market economy in Poland.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council held on 3 October.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development and my noble Friend the Minister for Trade represented the United Kingdom at the Foreign Affairs Council in Luxembourg on 3 October.

The Council adopted the television broadcasting directive under the qualified majority voting procedure, the United Kingdom voting in favour. By providing a framework of common rules to remove barriers to trade and protect the consumer, the directive will encourage the development of cross-border broadcasting in the Community.

On the basis of proposals by the Commission, the Council discussed possible measures of assistance to Poland and Hungary, and agreed that the Commission's proposals represented an excellent basis for further action. Many of them closely reflect earlier United Kingdom suggestions. The Council encouraged the Commission to pursue its efforts both on the Community level and with other western countries. We will continue to play a leading part.

The Council also discussed the Community's trade relations with the United States, and Japan.

In the belief that the Community should respond swiftly to recent developments in Beirut, the Foreign Affairs Council ageeed a 25 mecu package of assistance aimed at rehabilitating essential services in the Lebanon (health, education, water and power supplies).

The Foreign Affairs Council took note of a draft negotiating mandate put forward by the Commission for a second stage agreement between the Community and the Gulf Co-operation Council and remitted it for detailed consideration.

The Council reviewed progress in the renegotiation of the Lomé Convention and discussed preparations for the next ACP/EC ministerial negotiating meeting on 27-29 October.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Land

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has any plans to amend the advice contained in planning policy guidance note PPG3 "Land for Housing" to enable local authorities to make an allowance in advance for sites of over 0·4 hectares in their housing land availability studies; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will issue advice to local authorities to encourage them to monitor the supply of housing built on land not previously identified as suitable for building, including on sites exceeding 0·4 hectares in size; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will make it his policy to support those local authorities on appeal who have refused planning permission for housing on allocated land where the supply of housing on unidentified sites is likely to breach structure plan guidelines; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will take steps to discourage the allocation of further housebuilding land in areas where the supply of housing on previously unidentified sites over 0·4 hectares is so large that building is likely to exceed the level agreed through the structure plan process; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Revised draft guidance on land for housing, which is intended to replace the present planning policy guidance note 3, was issued for consultation on 4 October; I am sending my hon. Friend a copy. Comments are invited by 5 January 1990.

The draft guidance continues to stress the need for adequate planned provision for new housing; but it proposes changes to the method by which planning authorities carry out their regular assessments of land availability which would enable them to make fuller allowance for the emergence of previously unidentified sites where that is justified by evidence of past land supply. The draft also recognises that the emergence of large unidentified sites may have a bearing on the timing of the release of other land, for instance where the development plan includes a phasing policy.

The draft makes it clear that where there is an up-to-date local plan which is consistent with national and regional policies and with the relevant provisions of the structure plan, it will carry considerable weight, and my right hon. Friend and his inspectors will be guided by it in dealing with planning appeals.

Rural Development Commission

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to expand the Rural Development Commission to include the initiation of environmental protection schemes in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have no plans of this nature. The task of the Rural Development Commission is to help maintain a thriving and attractive countryside in England by promoting enterprise and viable communities.

London Docklands (Wind Tunnel Tests)

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place a copy of the wind tunnel tests on the model of the buildings at Canary wharf on the Isle of Dogs in the Library.

Mr. Moynihan: A copy of the relevant material has been placed in the Library.

Seals (Deaths)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will commission an assessment of the report by Professors Brouwfr, Koeman and Reijndfrs of the Agricultural University of Wagenngen, released in August, concerning the link between PCB pollution and seals' deaths in the North sea.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: As far as I am aware, no copies of this report have yet been received by United Kingdom Government Departments. We will look at any report on this topic with interest, although the indications so far are that pollution played no significant part in the spread of the seal virus along United Kingdom coast in 1988. The research funded by this Department at the sea mammal research unit of the Natural Environment Research Council on possible links between pollutants and seals' immune system is continuing and relevant work in all North sea states will continue to be reviewed by the International Commission for the Exploration of the Seas.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all studies and research conducted or analysed by his Department regarding the treatment of toxic waste and its impact upon the health of people and the environment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department of the Environment has since the early seventies sponsored research and worldwide studies into the treatment of toxic waste and its impact on the environment. All such references numbering some thousands are stored on computer at the waste management information bureau in Harwell. Impact on the health of people is the responsibility of the Department of Health.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking in order to give statutory rights of consultation to communities affected by the installation and operation of plants dealing with treatment of toxic waste.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Current planning legislation in England and Wales requires that planning applications for plants handling controlled waste are advertised on site and in the local press. Adequate time must be allowed for representations. The disposal facility's licence must also be placed on a register open for public inspection.

The proposed new system for integrated pollution control in England and Wales will apply to industrial processes which among other things generate large amounts of special (dangerous or difficult) waste. Applications for authorisation under the system would be advertised and there would be third party rights to make representations about them.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department will publish the information it has available on (a) health (b) the safety and (c) the environmental effects of substances which are (i) involved or (ii) produced by the process of incineration of toxic waste.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Health, safety and environmental aspects of substances in or produced by the process of incineration of toxic waste are covered by standard textbooks and publications freely available. We monitor the adequacy of such publications and attempt to fill important gaps. For example, we have recently published a report "Dioxins in the Environment" (pollution paper No. 27).

NCC Offices (Repair and Redecoration)

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the cost of repairing and redecorating the Nature Conservancy Council offices in Hope street, Edinburgh; and how many rooms were repainted in the building, how many times and at what cost.

Mr. Trippier: The headquarters of the Nature Conservancy Council in Scotland were recently repaired and redecorated to meet the needs of the existing council's increased staff and responsibilities, and to comply with current fire regulations. The final account for the work has not yet been submitted, but is expected to be in the region of £580,000.

This was the first major refurbishment of the NCC's Scottish HQ since the council occupied Hope terrace in 1949. As part of the programme, all 98 rooms were decorated. I understand that the staircase, landing and one office in the main building had to be repainted below the dado in order to meet the contract specification. This work was carried out within the overall contract price.

Local Government Finance

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing his estimate of the amount of transitional relief to be paid in each local authority area in 1990-91.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have made no estimate of the amount of transitional relief to be paid in each local authority area in 1990-91. I estimate that about £300 million will be paid to chargepayers in England in 1990-91.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he had before 11 October with the computer industry about the feasibility of his proposals for transitional relief.

Mr. Chris Patten: Our assessment of the feasibility of the proposals was based on the Department's knowledge of the computing arrangements for implementing the community charge, but it was necessary to wait until the scheme was announced before discussion of the specific proposals could begin. The present discussions with representatives of the computer industry will be fully taken into account in finalising the details of the scheme.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of persons in each local authority area who will benefit from the proposed transitional relief.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have made no estimate of the number of people in each local authority area who will benefit from transitional relief. I estimate that of the order of 6 million adults in England will benefit from transitional relief.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to monitor the implementation of (a) poll tax and (b) transitional relief; and if he will make a statement on his assessment of local authorities' present progress in setting up poll tax with particular reference to problems of interfacing poll tax soft ware with rebates software.

Mr. Chris Patten: Throughout the past year, Ministers and officials have been pursuing a programme of visits to charging authorities. Authorities were asked to provide a report of their plans at the beginning of the year and a questionnaire about progress with preparations was sent to authorities in May. A report based on the response will be placed in the Library shortly. In general authorities appear to be making good progress with implementation, including with their computing arrangements.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether community charge bills for persons benefiting from transitional relief will be required to show (a) 1990-91 community charge for spending in line with government assumptions (national community charge), (b) 1990-91 community charge for spending in line with standard spending assessment and (c) 1990-91 community charge actually levied by the charging authority.

Mr. Chris Patten: We shall be consulting very shortly the local authority associations and local authorities on the form of the community charge bill.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether community charge registration officers will be permitted to demand information as to whether poll tax payers are pensioners or disabled for the purposes of administering transitional relief.

Mr. Chris Patten: No. The administration of transitional relief will be a function of the charging authority, not the registration officer.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make it his policy to discuss the feasibility of his proposals for transitional relief with the Audit Commission in order to gauge the effect of his proposals on the economy, efficiency and effectiveness of local authority financial administration.

Mr. Chris Patten: Yes.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the criteria to be used in defining a couple for the purpose of operating the community charge transitional relief scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the criteria to be used in defining a person as disabled for the purpose of making an application under the community charge transitional relief scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the community charge transitional relief entitlements of those people hitherto exempt from poll tax discharged after 1 April 1990 from residential homes and hospitals and hitherto in order to be cared for in the community.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the community charge transitional relief entitlements of those people who move house after 1 April 1990 (a) within their existing local authority area and (b) to another local authority area.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance has been given to general practitioners about the definition of severe mental impairment for the purposes of exemptions from poll tax.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his proposals for transitional relief for two person households will apply exclusively to husbands and wives and to persons of different sex living together as husband and wife.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 17 October 1989]: The Government have issued a consultation document on community charge transitional relief, a copy of which has been placed in the library. Consultations are now taking place with the local authority associations and full details of the scheme will be published as soon as possible.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement listing (a) all those degenerative conditions which can now be assessed for the purpose of granting community charge exemptions, (b) the procedures to be followed for assessment and (c) the advice to be issued on this matter to community charge registration officers and general practitioners.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 17 October 1989]: It is intended to amend the provisions of paragraph 4 of Schedule 1 to the Local Government Finance Act 1988 to add attendance allowance and constant attendance allowance to the list of benefits in sub-paragraph (2). The definitions in sub-paragraph (3) will also be amended to remove the provisions limiting the exemption to those whose development of mind is arrested or incomplete, or who have suffered an injury to the brain. It will still be necessary for a registered medical practitioner to state that the individual is severely mentally impaired. Advice to registration officers and general practitioners will be issued as soon as possible.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the extent of his discussions with representatives of local government on the operation of the community charge transitional relief scheme before announcing the new scheme on 11 October.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 17 October 1989]: The announcement on 11 October was made first to Parliament. Discussions were held with local authority representatives immediately afterwards. Further discussions on the operational aspects of the scheme will take place shortly.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for each charging authority the safety-netted community charge for 1990-91 assuming a service distribution based on 1989-90 budgets and total spending of £32·8 billion.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 17 October 1989]: This information is not at present available.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the likely effects of the new community charge transitional relief scheme on (a) the total amount of community charge benefit to be paid in 1990-91, (b) the numbers of people who will be eligible for benefit and (c) the savings which will result in 1990-91 from calculating benefit after relief has been given.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 17 October 1989]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security who is responsible for community charge benefit, will write to the hon. Member in due course about the effect of the community charge transitional relief scheme on expenditure on community charge benefit.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish his best estimate of the costs of administering the community charge transitional relief scheme in 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 17 October 1989]: My officials are discussing the costs of setting up and administering transitional relief with the local authority associations. Estimates will be made in the light of these discussions and an urgent study by consultants of the likely costs. It is the Government's intention that a reasonable level of costs will be met in full.

Water Pollution

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his announced proposals for tax on products which damage the environment will include polluted drinking water and waters which adversely affect wild-life.

Mr. Howard: Careful consideration including consultation documents on particular cost recovery charging systems, is being given to the possible use of charges of various kinds to improve the efficiency of our environmental protection policies. Proposals for specifying charges have not so far been developed, but the philosophy underlying their use has been set out in the report produced by Professor Pearce of London university and my officials are currently reviewing the use of charges and other instruments in a number of other industrialised countries.

London Docklands Development Corporation (House Sales)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many homes were sold on London Docklands Development Corporation land in 1988; and if he will give details of the numbers in each price range;

(2) what was the medium price pact for new homes on land owned by the London Docklands Development Corporation in 1988.

Mr. Moynihan: This information is not immediately available in the form requested. I shall write to the hon. Member shortly.

Downing Street (Railings)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if any proposals are being considered for the erection of railings at either end of Downing street; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Plans are in hand to erect demountable railings at the eastern end of Downing street to replace the existing unsightly barrier. Plans were approved by Westminster City Council on 28 September.

CITES Meeting

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement regarding the Convention on International Trade on Endangered Species meeting in Lausanne.

Mr. Trippier: The time for a full statement will be after the Conference is concluded at the end of this week. In the meantime, however, we very much welcome the decisive votes in favour of transferring the African elephant to appendix I and so banning trade in ivory.

Song Thrushes

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what efforts have been made by Her Majesty's Government to secure an end to the killing of song thrushes in France; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: EC directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds requires all member states to protect migratory and other birds, including song thrushes. It is for member states to introduce their own legislation implementing the directive, and to ensure that it is applied effectively.

The Government fully support the directive and its enforcement. It is primarily the responsibility of the EC Commission to monitor that adequate measures have been taken by each member state to comply with the terms of the directive. A dispute over these matters may be settled by the European Court of Justice.

Ivory

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has regarding the ivory imported from Zaire without licence by Mr. Shivaz Virji of Ealing, London.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information held by the Department is part of an application for a CITES re-export licence. Information contained in licence applications is regarded by the Department as confidential and cannot be released.

Crown Suppliers (Privatisation)

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in the privatisation of the Crown Suppliers.

Mr. Chris Patten: Samuel Montagu and Co. Ltd., who are advising the Government on the sale, are today writing to all organisations and buy out teams which have expressed an interest and to other major firms in the contract furnishing, vehicle hire and document delivery sectors. These organisations, and any others which subsequently express interest, will be given the opportunity to be considered for selection for the list of those invited to bid.

Homelessness (Legislation)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his review of homeless persons legislation; and when he expects to bring forward amendments to the Homeless Persons Act 1977.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 17 October 1989]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is reviewing the homelessness legislation and hopes to announce conclusions shortly.

Road Schemes (Newham)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will tabulate the capital cost of each of the authorised road schemes completed or programmed within the area of the London Docklands development corporation in the London borough of Newham and for each state the date of actual or expected completion and his estimation of the annual cost of maintenance to a named highway authority.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 17 October 1989]: I will write to the hon. Member.

SCOTLAND

Crash Barriers

18. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of Scotland's motorways and rural carriageways are still without crash barriers; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Subsequent to my answering a similar question from the hon. Member on 5 July, I am pleased to announce that I have allocated a further £2·23 million to the provision of central reserve safety fencing on Scotland's trunk roads. The total expenditure is now expected to be some £3·5 million during this financial year. This will allow for the provision of approximately 29km of safety fencing on trunk road motorways and 24km on trunk road dual carriageways.

By the end of this financial year, some 57 per cent. of trunk road motorways and 61 per cent. of trunk road dual carriageways will be without central reserve safety barriers.

CBI

19. Mr. Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends to visit Scotland to discuss the economic situation in Scotland with the Confederation of British Industry.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell).

23. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he plans to meet representatives of the Scottish Confederation of British Industry to discuss the Scottish economy.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Member to my reply earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell).

Drinking Water

21. Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many drinking water supplies in Scotland will not meet the Economic Community water directive by 1991.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Of all the public water supplies in Scotland present information indicates that 102 will not comply with all of the 66 parameters of the EC drinking water directive by the beginning of 1991.

The majority of those which will not comply with the EC directive by 1991 are in Strathclyde and Highland regions and about half of them are small rural supplies.

Devolution

24. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from Scottish businessmen about devolution and independence.

31. Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the Scottish business community on constitutional matters.

44. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from business leaders about devolution or independence.

45. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from businessmen about devolution and self-rule.

47. Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from industrialists about devolution.

Mr. Lang: I have received no such representations recently, but there is evidence among top companies in Scotland of real concern at the detrimental consequences that would arise from constitutional change.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Confederation of British Industry in Scotland about devolution.

Mr. Rifkind: I have not received any representations from the CBI. I am, however, aware of the findings of a research study by the Scottish Business Insider magazine which showed that there is serious concern among top companies in Scotland at the detrimental effect on the Scottish economy which constitutional change in Scotland would bring.

Community Charge

25. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what attempts he has made to quantify the effects of the industrial action taken by NALGO on the implementation and collection of the poll tax in Scotland; and what action he has taken as a consequence.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The responsibility for collecting the community charges lies with local authorities.

26. Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the numbers of people who have failed to pay the poll tax and who have had served on them notices that the whole year's tax is due.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The responsibility for collecting community charges and for the recovery of arrears lies with local authorities. Information on the number of people against whom action is being taken to collect arrears is not held centrally. Indications are, however, that very good progress in collection is being made, with over 90 per cent. having paid in some areas.

28. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest estimate of the number of people in Scotland who have not yet paid at least the first instalment of the poll tax.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Local authorities have reported good progress in the collection of the community charge with over 90 per cent. of payers having paid in some areas. This is very encouraging given that the community charge is a completely new tax with many more people paying it than paid domestic rates. I am confident that payment levels will continue to rise as local authorities issue their reminder letters.

43. Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will change the calculation of the revenue support grant from his Department to local authorities to assume no multiplier on the standard community charge.

Mr. Rifkind: I will consult the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities shortly, in the usual way, on proposals for distributing revenue support grant for next year.

51. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations he has undertaken as part of policy formulation for community care in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: Sir Roy Griffiths' report on community care was drawn to the attention of local authorities and health boards when it was published and a wide range of representations was received from them and from the voluntary sector. Since my right hon. and learned Friend's statement on 12 July 1989, I have had a meeting with the social work committee of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. Further consultation with local authority, voluntary and private sector interests will take place as appropriate.

52. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to discuss the provision of community care in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: I met representatives of the Convention's social work committee on 8 September 1989 to discuss the Government's proposals for the provision of community care. It was a constructive meeting at which it was agreed that further consultation would take place as appropriate.

Nirex

27. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the managing director of Nirex; what matters were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend and the Secretary of State for the Environment met the managing director and other officials of the executive on 15 March 1989 to discuss their report on sites for investigation for the deep disposal of low and intermediate-level radioactive wastes.

Scottish Homes

29. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairman of Scottish Homes; and what matters were discussed.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend and I met Sir James Mellon, chairman of Scottish Homes, and board members on 4 September. Our discussions covered the range of functions and responsibilities of Scottish Homes.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new houses Scottish Homes expects to complete in 1989 and 1990.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Scottish Homes assumed its full powers on 1 April 1989, when it also took over the responsibilities of its predecessor bodies. The figures for housing completions below relate to the first two full years of Scottish Homes' operations. The enabling programme is the housing association programme funded by Scottish Homes and the completion figures include housing totally rehabilitated by associations.

	1989-90	1990-91
Enabling programme	3,500	5,950
Own stock programme	550	310

Fishing Industry

30. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the processing and catching sectors of the Scottish fishing industry about the state of the industry and its current financial difficulties.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has received a number of recent representations from various interests about the current state of the industry. My noble Friend Lord Sanderson, as the Minister responsible, is in regular contact with all sections of the industry.

Constitutional Convention

32. Mr. Lambie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is willing to take steps to allow regional, district and island councils to contribute towards the funds of the Scottish Constitutional Convention; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have already written to the hon. Member about this matter and have nothing to add.

New Towns

33. Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will reconsider the decision not to allow new town development corporations' tenants a choice of landlord on the dissolution of the new towns.

Mr. Lang: No such decision has been taken. The Government's White Paper (Command 711) states at paragraph 5.10 that the position in each town will be carefully considered once an order for dissolution has been made, and formal consultations will be held with the development corporations, district councils and representative tenant groups to review the position and to determine to what extent transfers might take place, be it to housing associations, co-operatives, district councils, private or other landlords. Those tenants who have not transferred to other landlords will be transferred to Scottish Homes at wind-up, with a view to pursuing further diversification with the small residual number of houses.

35. Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairmen of the new town development corporations; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend last met the chairmen of the Scottish new town development corporations on 2 December 1988. A range of matters concerning the new towns was discussed.

British Summer Time

34. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with Scottish local authorities on the question of British summer time; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: None. The Government presented three options, including continuation of the present arrangements, in the Green Paper "Summer Time: A Consultation Document" (Cm 722). We shall study the responses received, including that of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, before reaching conclusions.

Scottish Trades Union Congress

36. Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for meeting the Scottish Trades Union Congress; and what matters will be discussed.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to meet the General Council of the Scottish Trades Union Congress on 10 November to discuss matters affecting the Scottish economy.

Overseas Visits

37. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which overseas countries he visited on official business during the parliamentary recess.

Mr. Rifkind: I paid official visits in Japan, New Zealand, Australia and Thailand.

In Japan I visited 15 companies and held meetings with the Japanese Government and with business men in Tokyo and Osaka. I was encouraged by the positive approach which companies took towards Scotland as a location for European manufacturing, and was able to announce an investment by Seiko in Livingston and an expansion of JVC's activities in East Kilbride. The links between Japan and Scotland will be further strengthened by the Japanese Government's decision to establish a consulate-general in Edinburgh, and by the Japan External Trade Organisation's proposal to set up an office in Scotland.

My meetings with Government and business men in New Zealand and Australia built on the continuing strength of Scotland's relations with both countries and provided opportunities to encourage trade and pursue inward investment.

During my brief stopover in Thailand I had a useful meeting with the Thai Minister of Finance about the problem of counterfeit Scotch whisky.

Transport

38. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he plans to visit Prestwick international airport to discuss transport matters.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton : My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so at present.

Pollution (Moray Firth)

39. Sir Russel Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding pollution in the Moray firth: and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Thirteen representations have been received in the last five years about pollution from the present unsatisfactory sewage outfall at Inverness, and two about the outfall at Nairn.

Fourteen representations were received in connection with Highland regional council's application to the Highland river purification board for consent to discharge screened sewage effluent from the proposed Inverness main drainage scheme long sea outfall. After the issue of consent, a further 10 representations, five of which were from previous correspondents, were received about the effects of the proposed discharge.

Highland regional council's notice of intention to develop for a headworks building generated 51 representations about the effects of the scheme. My right hon. and learned Friend directed Highland regional council on 19 May to prepare an environmental statement. When this is received further consideration will be given to the application.

The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland received one representation from local fishermen opposed to the construction of the outfall.

Cornton Vale Women's Prison

40. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last visited Cornton Vale women's prison; and what proposals for changes he has arising from that visit.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend last visited HM institution Cornton Vale on 10 April 1980 when he was Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State.

Economy (Lanarkshire)

41. Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to meet the chairman of the Scottish Development Agency to discuss the Lanarkshire economy.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has no immediate plans to meet the agency chairman.

Development Agency

42. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total expenditure by the Scottish Development Agency since May 1979.

Mr. Lang: During the period from May 1979 to 30 September 1989, the Scottish Development Agency spent a total of £1,261 million.

Respite Care

46. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money will be allocated to Scottish local authorities in 1990-91 in order to deal with the shortage of publicly provided respite care.

Mr. Lang: The allocation of expenditure to particular services is a matter of local authorities. The aggregate exchequer grant for 1990-91, announced by my right hon. and learned Friend on 26 July, provides for a 9·7 per cent. increase over that for 1989-90. This affords authorities the scope to increase expenditure on the provision of particular services, including, for instance, respite care, in the light of their view of priorities.

Greater Glasgow Health Board

48. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the Greater Glasgow health board; what subjects were discussed; and when he intends to meet them again.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend met Greater Glasgow health board representatives in March 1989, when he opened a new 90-bed unit at Woodilee hospital and heard of plans for further improvement to mental illness services. He has no plans for further meetings with the board in the near future.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what outside management consultant groups have been employed by Greater Glasgow health board in each of the past five years; and at what cost.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The names of individual management consultancy groups employed by Greater Glasgow health board are not held centrally.

Ferry Services

49. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will report on progress towards (a) upgrading of the Caledonian MacBrayne ferry service between Kyle of Lochalsh and Kyleakin and (b) the provision of a bridge to Skye; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Following the recent discussions I have had with Highland regional council, I believe that private funding could provide the way forward for the provision of a bridge in the near future. It is, however, for Highland regional council to decide whether to take the project forward. I have indicated to it that it would receive the support of my officials in the Scottish Development Department in the practical processes involved should it determine to go ahead. I look forward to learning of its decision in due course.

I am aware of the pressures on the existing ferry service to Skye in the face of the increasing traffic demands. A decision on the bridge is, however, essential before a full assessment of the economic case for replacement ferries can be undertaken.

Highlands and Islands Development Board

50. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairman of the Highlands and Islands development board; what matters were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend met the chairman of the Highlands and Islands development board at a meeting of the Scottish Economic Council held on 5 May in Edinburgh where general matters relating to the Highlands and Islands were discussed.

Gynaecological Unit, Moray

53. Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made on option appraisals for the establishment of a specialist obstetric, maternity and gynaecological unit in Moray; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Grampian health board is presently carrying out the option appraisal exercise and expects to be in a position to report to the Scottish Home and Health Department in December.

Inverclyde Enterprise Zone

54. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chief executive of the Scottish Development Agency; and whether the Inverclyde enterprise zone was discussed.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend last met the chief executive of the Scottish Development Agency to discuss the Inverclyde enterprise zone at the launch of the zone on 3 March 1989.

Legal Aid (Tenants)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications have been received in 1988-89 for legal aid in order that a tenant may raise an action against a district council landlord.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available.

Flat-roofed Houses

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many flat-roofed houses have been demolished in the public sector in each of the past 15 years; and how many of these were constructed after 1960;

(2) how many flat-roofed houses in the public sector have been converted to pitched roofs in each of the past 15 years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not held centrally.

Housing Co-operatives

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many housing co-operatives have been formed by district councils in the past 12 months; and what do these represent as a percentage of total district council stock.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on housing co-operatives formed by district councils in the last 12 months is not held centrally.

Rent Officers

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many rent officers are employed at each office of the Rent Registration service.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: At 30 September 1989, the number of rent officers (including senior rent officers) employed at each office of the rent registration service was:

	Number
Aberdeen	4
Dundee	[1]3
Glasgow	[2]20

[1] Plus one vacancy to be filled.
[2] Of whom one is located in Motherwell.

Television Festival

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representatives of his Department attended sessions of the Edinburgh international television festival.

Mr. Rifkind: My Department was not represented.

Rent Assessment Committees

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many times rent assessment committees have sat in the past 12 months.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: One hundred and forty seven rent assessment committees were appointed to deal with over 700 appeals under the Rent (Scotland) Act 1984 between 1 October 1988 and 30 September 1989.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the names and show the occupations of members of the panel from which rent assessment committees are formed.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A list of the members of the rent assessment panel for Scotland is held in the House of Commons Library. The membership comprises three groups: chairmen (who are lawyers), valuers (who are chartered surveyors), and lay members. Information on the occupations of the lay members is not held centrally.

Each rent assessment committee normally consists of a lawyer, a valuer and a lay member.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the basis of remuneration of members of rent assessment committees.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Members receive a fee on each occasion they sit on a rent assessment committee or carry out other work in their capacity as members of the rent assessment panel for Scotland.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total expenditure on rent assessment committee work in the year 1988-89.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The figure is £97,000.

Drugs (Eviction)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will amend the Housing Acts so that a person found guilty by due process of dealing in drugs can be evicted from a secure or assured tenancy within one month of conviction.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We have no proposals to amend the current housing legislation, which already provides that landlords may seek to evict tenants causing a nuisance or annoyance in or within the vicinity of their homes.

Housing

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the number of new housing completions by district councils in the period 1977 to 1988.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is set out in the table.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the total incurred per house in each year from 1979 to 1988 in loan charges debt redemption, interest and expenses for the four city district councils.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Loan charges paid by district councils relate to capital borrowing for various purposes, some of which are not associated with capital expenditure on housing. Loan charges per house met from housing revenue accounts, calculated on the basis of the number of houses to which those accounts relate, are set out in the table.

Notes:
1. Figures for 1979-80 to 1986-87 are based on audited accounts.
2. Figures for 1987-88 to 1988-89 are based on authorities' near actual outturn returns.
3. The returns made by Glasgow district council do not distinguish between interest and loan fund expenses.
4. Figures are based on the number of council houses at 30 September of each year.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if his Department plans to undertake research of the effects of mixed tenure on communities arising out of council house sales.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The report of research commissioned by the Scottish Development Department into the repair and maintenance of housing in areas of mixed ownership is expected to be published soon. Copies will be placed in the Library of the House. There are no immediate proposals for research into other aspects of mixed tenure.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of families living in overcrowded conditions as defined by section 135 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Development Department does not make such estimates.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what regulations he has made under section 60 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No such regulations have yet been made.

Post-school Day Care

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the provision of post-school day care for children at the latest available date; and what (a) local authority and (b) central Government funding is given.

Mr. Lang: Provision for post-school day care is made at some local authority community centres by voluntary organisations but no information is held centrally about the extent of the arrangements or details of funding.

Commissioner for Local Administration

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration he has given to proposals to strengthen the powers of the Commissioner for Local Administration; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Provisions in part II of the Local Government and Housing Bill considerably strengthen the powers of the Commissioner. They are also designed to increase public awareness of the recommendations in his reports, particularly in those cases where authorities have failed to act on them.

Foreign Teachers

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many foreign teachers have signed contracts in Scotland in the past three months.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is not available centrally.

House Repossessions

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many house repossessions there were in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde, and (c) Glasgow for each year since 1979.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Council of Mortgage Lenders publishes statistics on the number of repossessions by building societies in the United Kingdom as a whole, but no information is available for Scotland only or any part of it; and no information is available to the Government on repossessions by other mortgage lenders in Scotland.

Vacant Teaching Posts

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many teachers' posts were vacant by 1 October in (a) Greater Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland;

(2) how many teachers were needed by 1 October in order to fill vacancies in (a) English, (b) history, (c) mathematics, (d) science and (e) physical education in (i) Glasgow, (ii) Strathclyde and (iii) Scotland.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is not yet available.

Recreation Facilities

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures is his Department taking in order to help local authorities to increase the number of green areas and recreation facilities in (a) Scotland and (b) Glasgow.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: It is for individual local authorities to determine their expenditure on green areas and recreation facilities in the light of their overall priorities. In order to increase local authorities' capital spending powers, the Government have removed two important constraints on their expenditure. With effect from 1 April 1990, local authorities will be able, without penalty, to finance capital expenditure from current revenue and to treat contributions from the private sector as receipts. These changes will greatly enhance local authorities' flexibility to plan and implement their expenditure programmes, including those for the provision of green areas and recreation facilities.

Prisons (Suicides)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps will be taken to reduce suicides or suicide attempts in Scottish prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Among measures already taken are an increase in the number of cells especially designed to hold inmates who are under observation and the provision of flame-retardant mattresses throughout Scottish penal establishments. In addition the prison service updates on the basis of past experience, best practice, and expert advice the procedures for minimising suicides and suicide attempts.

Although great care is taken by staff to identify, protect and treat those who are thought to be at particular risk, deaths from unpredictable and determined acts of self-destruction can never be completely eliminated.

School Numbers

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many school children there were in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde region and (c) Glasgow for each year since 1974; and how many of these received free school meals.

Mr. Lang: The information taken from annual school meals census returns is as follows:

	Scotland		Strathclyde		Glasgow
	Number of pupils on register	Number of pupils receiving free meals	Number of pupils on register	Number of pupils receiving free meals	Number of pupils on register	Number of pupils receiving free meals

Housing Policy

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to change his housing policies in the light of the results of the survey for East Kilbride district council that the majority of people living in new towns consider the district councils as the best landlords and want their tenancies transferred to their district councils.

Mr. Lang: No. The Government have consistently stated that they would not pre-empt any decision about future landlord choice for new town tenants without first seeking the views of tenants themselves. The position in each town will be carefully considered once an order for the dissolution of its development corporation has been made, and formal consultations will be held with the development corporations, district councils and representative tenant groups to review the position and to determine the type of transfers which will take place in the period between the making of the dissolution order and dissolution itself. The survey commissioned by East Kilbride district council was confined to the town of East Kilbride. It is not therefore representative of the views of tenants in all five Scottish new towns. The results of that survey did not confirm that "the majority of people living in the new towns" consider the district council as the "best landlord".

Public Service Salaries

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is for each year since 1974 the average rate of increase in the salaries of (a) National Health Service ambulance staff, (b) teachers, (c) National Health Service nurses and (d) the police force in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is not readily available in the form requested. I shall therefore write to the hon. Member.

Infant Mortality

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is for each year since 1974 the number of babies born (a) in Scotland, (b) in the Strathclyde region and (c) in Greater Glasgow, with incurable diseases which had been the subject of pre-natal screening tests;

(2) what is for each year since 1974 the number of babies born with incurable diseases in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde region and (c) Greater Glasgow.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally.

Conciliation Service

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the annual funding level for a conciliation service in Scotland; and whether his Department funds a director's post for this service.

Mr. Lang: The Scottish Office provides grant under the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 to the Scottish Association of Family Conciliation Services, the co-ordinating body for conciliation in Scotland. Total grant payable in the current year is £48,500 and allows for a full-time director. The Department does not provide grant for local family conciliation services.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Audio Cassettes

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to the reply of 15 March, Official Report, column 258-59, what are the Government's plans to uphold the provision in the Copyright, Design and Patents Act 1988 rejecting the principle of levies on the sale of blank audio cassettes.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Government have no intention of amending the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 to introduce a levy on blank audio cassettes in the United Kingdom. They welcome and support the conclusion of the Commission of the European Communities in its Green paper "Copyright and the Challenge of Technology" that Community action to introduce or harmonise levies is not required.

DRG Company

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement concerning Pembridge Investments of Bermuda bid for the DRG Company;

(2) if he will refer the Pembridge Investments of Bermuda bid for the DRG Company, located at Deeside industrial park and elsewhere, to the Director General of Fair Trading; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The proposed acquisition of DRG by Pembridge Investments is being considered by the Director General of Fair Trading who will advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on whether the proposed acquisition should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. It would not be appropriate to comment on the merits of the bid in advance of my right hon. Friend's decision. The Director General, in giving his advice, and the Secretary of State, in taking his decision on whether to refer, will give careful consideration to all relevant aspects of the proposal.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will visit the DRG Company at Deeside industrial park; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Neither I nor my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has any plans for such a visit.

Post Offices

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will issue guidelines laying down minimum standards of accessibility for the elderly and disabled when post offices are relocated.

Mr. Forth: No. This is an operational matter for the Post Office. I understand that all new main post offices are designed to allow wheelchair access and access for disabled people is one of the factors taken into account where Crown offices are converted to agency or sub-offices. For existing buildings the Post Office aims to provide a level or suitably ramped approach wherever practicable.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report information available to him on those post offices in the Border region which have had their opening hours reduced or other services curtailed in the last 10 years.

Mr. Forth: This is an operational matter for the Post Office board. I understand that the information requested is not immediately available, so I will ask the chairman of the Post Office board to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will review the consultation procedures currently adopted by Post Office counters when offices are downgraded or relocated to enable objections to be made to and heard by his Department when any such proposals for change are made.

Mr. Forth: Regrading and relocation of post offices are operational questions for the Post Office. I understand that it has agreed a code of practice on post office regrading with the Post Office Users National Council.

Knitwear and Textiles

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to be in a position to publish the findings of the current review of the knitwear and textile industry being conducted by Professor Silberston; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Professor Silberston was asked, in the light of developments since 1984 when his first report was published, to assess the effects on the United Kingdom economy of import restraints under the multi-fibre arrangement (MFA) and barriers faced by the United Kingdom industry's exports in overseas markets and to examine the economic effects of proposals for the future developments of international trade in textiles and clothing. The Government would welcome the views of all interested parties, if possible by 17 November.

I am grateful to Professor Silberston for the work he has undertaken. His report surveys developments in world trade and production and the specific experience of the United Kingdom textile and clothing sector as well as the existing barriers to trade. He considers how far liberalisation of the MFA would be likely to lead to increased competition from imports and from what sources and examines the likely effects on the United Kingdom economy, particularly in terms of prices and employment. In this context he has looked at the effects on different sectors of the industry and the consequent regional implications. Finally, the report considers the likely effects of the single market and the terms on which gradual liberalisation of the MFA might be negotiated in the course of the current Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations.

The report represents Professor Silberston's own views. It will be helpful to the Government's further consideration of textile policy, especially as the European Community enters the detailed phase of negotiations in the Uruguay round during 1990.

In the light of Professor Silberston's findings and the comments received from industry and other parties, the Government will consider position which the Community should adopt for the further negotiations on the future of the MFA in the Uruguay round. The Government will take full account of the effect of any proposals to phase out the present arrangements, in accordance with the Uruguay round mandate, on consumers, on employment and on the economy at large.

Copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Forth: All staff in grades 1 and 2 have attended specific training courses on information technology issues.

In financial years 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90 to date, 13 staff at grade 3 level (25 per cent. of those in grade) attended courses specifically on information technology and 9 (17 per cent.) attended courses involving an element of information technology. The information related to all staff at grade 3 level since promotion or before 1987-88, is not available without disproportionate cost to the taxpayer.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Forth: Excluding stand-alone word processors there are currently some 5,300 computer work stations in the Department of Trade and Industry. The ratio of work stations to civil servants is about 1:2.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Forth: The day-to-day management of the Department of Trade and Industry's information technology (IT) strategy is the responsibility of officials. I am the Minister responsible for oversight of IT matters in the Department of Trade and Industry. IT is in general so integrated into the Department's business functions that to attempt to apportion specific intervals of my time to its consideration would involve a disproportionate effort.

United States-owned Companies

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all United-States-owned companies presently operating in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 17 October 1989]: Overseas companies are free to operate in the United Kingdom through a subsidiary incorporated in the United Kingdom or through a branch. A branch is not a legal entity separate and distinct from its holding company. All such operations are treated in exactly the same way as British-owned ones. Because there is no distinction based on ownership, no records exist within Government of either subsidiaries or branches of United States companies operating in the United Kingdom. Informal estimates put the number in excess of 2,000.

Gas Industry (Safety)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what impact the European Commission directives will have on the safety standards of the British gas industry.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 18 October 1989]: The proposed gas appliance directive, as drafted, will serve to reinforce the existing high standards of safety currently applied throughout the United Kingdom gas appliance industry. No other existing or proposed directives are expected to have a significant effect on the safety of gas appliances.

Industrial Investment

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is for each year since 1975 the total amount of investment in the (a) chemical, (b) electronics, (c) textile and (d) motor car industries in 1989 moneys.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 18 October 1989]: The latest annual census of production for which data are available is 1987. The figures, in the following table, have therefore been given in terms of 1987 prices.

TRANSPORT

Stansted Airport

Mr. Wells : To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the change announced in August to the Stansted airport departure route which goes to the south and west of Bishop's Stortford will come into effect; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mcloughlin: The change to this noise preferential route which is to be achieved by altering the route from radial 170 to radial 175, from the Barkway navigation beacon, will come into effect today. This change, which moves the route further away from Bishop's Stortford, takes acount of the views expressed by the Stansted noise preferential routes working group, the response to the public consultation carried out earlier this year and representations from my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford.

Air Pollution (London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what further steps he intends to take to reduce air pollution in London arising from transport.

Mr. Atkins: The Department is considering a wide range of measures to reduce traffic congestion in London. As well as increasing the efficiency of the transport system, lower congestion should also help to reduce the emission of certain types of pollutant. The Government are also committed to strict standards of vehicle emissions due to be introduced in the 1990s

British Rail

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what objectives have been set by the British Railways board for the greater use of the private sector in the provision of services; and what progress has been made to date in achieving those objectives.

Mr. Portillo: The Government set the railways board objectives in 1983 and 1986 which included broadening the participation of the private sector in the provision of services to the railway. BR has established specific programmes to meet these objectives and has made significant progress. The former BR subsidiaries of Sealink, British Transport Advertising, Travellers Fare, BREL and the Vale of Rheidol railway have been sold to the private sector. A joint venture project has been developed with the private sector for a new Heathrow express link; and major developments at stations involve private sector input of some £1 billion. Many ancillary services, such as trolley catering on trains, parcels deliveries and management of some car parks, are privately operated. All rolling stock is now bought from the private sector, and two thirds of the rail wagon fleet, excluding coal wagons, is privately owned. BR is exploring the opportunities for further collaboration with the private sector on Channel tunnel passenger and freight services and contracting out civil engineering and signalling work.

Passenger Aircraft

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will meet the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority to discuss the safety standards of passenger aircraft in service with United Kingdom operators; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. Friend frequently meets the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Road Construction

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much has been spent by the Government on road construction since 1979.

Mr. Atkins: The amount spent by the Government on the construction and improvement of motorways and other trunk roads in England, Scotland and Wales in the period April 1979 to March 1989 was £7,120 million.

North Devon Link Road

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what conditions he will require to be fulfilled in order to provide funding to dual the North Devon link road from Tiverton to Barnstaple.

Mr. Atkins: I am satisfied that the present single carriageway road will be adequate for a long time to come. Predictions prepared using the Department's recently published national road traffic forecasts indicate that it will be many years before the economic benefits of dualling, calculated using our standard 30-year assessment period, would exceed the cost of such improvement. The economic assessment takes into account reductions in accidents and the benefits of reduced congestion.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Atkins: Eleven officials have attended courses or training specifically on information technology since promotion to grade 3. A further five have attended courses containing an element of information technology. These represent 41 per cent. and 19 per cent. respectively of those at grade 3 and above in the Department of Transport.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such stations to civil servants.

Mr. Atkins: There are some 5,130 computer work stations of all types excluding stand-alone word processors in the Department of Transport, giving a ratio of one work station to every 2·9 members of staff.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Atkins: No Minister is responsible for day-to-day management of the Department's information technology strategy. This is the task of a grade 5 civil servant.

WALES

Ysgol Cwm Rhymni

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has any plans to visit Ysgol Cwm Rhymni, Bargoed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have made arrangements to visit Ysgol Cwm Rhymni on Friday 3 November.

DRG Company

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will visit the DRG Company, Deeside industrial park; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have no present plans to visit the DRG Company.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Department reports directly to me on information technology matters, and I devote as much of my time to these issues as is necessary.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Peter Walker: There are currently 320 computer work stations in my Department, excluding stand-alone word processors. The ratio of work stations to civil servants is 1:7.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Peter Walker: Ten officers have attended a course specifically on information technology since promotion to grade 3. One other has attended a course containing an element of information technology. These represent 77 per cent. and 8 per cent. respectively of staff at grade 3 and above in the Welsh Office.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Elephants

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will discuss with the Governments of Kenya and Tanzania what levels of external support they require to assist with programmes of elephant protection.

Mrs. Chalker: We are in regular and close touch with both Governments to determine priorities for the aid programme, and we are always ready to consider requests for help in conservation.

In Kenya we have been providing such help for many years, and fund three expatriate staff in the Kenya wildlife department. We have also provided 19 British Army Bedford trucks for use in anti-poaching efforts, and we are helping with a review of the wildlife department's radio communications requirements.

Following a request from the Government of Tanzania we are about to appoint consultants to look at possible ways of helping with wildlife conservation.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Camelford

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the progress of the investigation of the Director of Public Prosecutions into the Camelford incident; and when the investigation will be complete.

The Attorney-General: I understand that police inquiries have been completed and the Director is awaiting a final advice from counsel before making a decision.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Hurd: Eleven officials at grade 3 level and above have since attaining that grade attended a course specifically on information technology. Four of those 11, plus a further four, have attended a course containing an element of information technology. These figures represent 41 per cent. and 30 per cent. respectively of staff in those grades.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Hurd: At present there are some 3,200 computer work stations in the Department. This represents about one terminal for every 13 staff in post or, excluding the prison service (which accounts for some 3 to 4 of the Department's complement) one for every four staff. "Work station" is here taken to include linked terminals and stand-alone microcomputers (including those used partly for word-processing) but to exclude dedicated word-processors and other portable text processors.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Hurd: The Home Office, because of the heterogeneous nature of its business, does not have one single IT strategy but a number of strategies geared to the needs of different businesses or areas of the office. Ministers overseeing particular areas of the office concern themselves, as part of that responsibility, with the application of IT to them. It is not practicable to apportion the part of ministerial time specifically devoted to IT aspects of the work.

Television Stations

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if under existing Government proposals for ownership of television stations, the 15 current independent television franchise areas could be owned by eight non-British companies.

Mr. Renton: In line with our Treaty of Rome obligations the present, and proposed, prohibition of foreign control of United Kingdom broadcasting services does not extend to other EC countries. Applicants for regional channel 3 franchises, whether or not other EC companies are involved, will not pass the quality threshold unless they can satisfy the ITC that they will provide regional programmes, including programmes produced in the region.

Salman Rushdie

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to cease public financial support for the protection of Salman Rushdie, his publishers and associates.

Mr. Hurd: The decision to provide protection is one for the police, who will have regard to the threat and all other relevant circumstances.

Trusts

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of (a) charitable land trusts, (b) public benefit trusts and (c) maintenance funds presently in existence in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available.

THE ARTS

Museums and Galleries Commission

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he has received the annual report of the Museums and Galleries Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I have read the Museum and Galleries Commission's annual report and discussed issues arising from it with the Commission's chairman, who I meet quite frequently. This most recent report featured an account of the most valuable and exciting work of the travelling exhibitions unit, which I have seen in person and support enthusiastically.

Book Storage

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement about the annual cost of storing books received under the Copyright Act.

Mr. Luce: I have responsibility for only one of the copyright libraries, the British Library. In 1987-88 the library received around 50,400 books under the legal deposit regulations, and the annual cost of storing each book was approximately £1.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mrs. Rumbold: The figures are as follows:

	Grade 1		Grade 2		Grade 3
	Number	Percentage of grade	Number	Percentage of grade	Number	Percentage of grade
Information technology courses	2	100	5	100	10	62
Courses with an information technology element	Nil	—	1	20	Nil	—

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Alan Howarth: On 3 October 1989 there were 1,578 computer work stations in the Department including Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools. This includes portable computers and 175 personal computers used by typists for word processing.

At that date the total number of staff in the Department, including Her Majesty's inspectors and all support staff, was 2,567. The ratio of computer work stations to staff was therefore 1:1·6.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The day-to-day management of the Department's information technology (IT) strategy is the responsibility of officials. I am responsible for oversight of IT matters in the Department. IT is in general so integrated into the Department's business functions that it would involve a disproportionate effort to attempt to apportion specific intervals of my time to this matter.

School Buildings

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the National Audit Office report on school buildings will become available.

Mr. Alan Howarth: This is the responsibility of the Comptroller and Auditor General.

Rothera Point (Airstrip)

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply on 21 December 1988 to the hon. Member for South Suffolk, Official Report, columns 283-85, whether the Natural Environment Research Council has yet published the final report on its comprehensive environmental evaluation of the proposed new British Antarctic Survey airstrip at Rothera Point; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The Natural Environment Research Council (NERC) has recently published the final comprehensive environmental evaluation of the proposed new British Antarctic Survey airstrip at Rothera Point. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary circulated the draft of this report to consultative parties to the Antarctic treaty; copies were also made available to various non-governmental organisations. The helpful comments received were taken into account by the NERC in preparing the final report.

I commend this thorough report to hon. Members as further evidence of the Government's continuing concern for the environment.

National Curriculum

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his proposals for the national curriculum on the teaching in secondary schools of the history of the last war, and of the reasons why Britain declared war on Nazi Germany.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Education and Science and for Wales are awaiting the final report of the national curriculum history working group, which they expect to receive by the end of the year. They will then publish their proposals for the history curriculum.

Student Loans

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assumptions as to real and nominal interest rates have been made in his calculations of the cost of the student loans scheme.

Mr. MacGregor: The costings set out in annex E of Cm. 520 are expressed in constant prices, and are accordingly not affected by interest rate assumptions.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Environmental Protection

188. Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met his ministerial colleagues in G7 to discuss measures to protect the environment.

189. Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met his ministerial colleagues in G7 to discuss measures to protect the environment.

190. Mr. Michael Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met his ministerial colleagues in G7 to discuss measures to protect the environment.

191. Mr. Wall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met his ministerial colleagues in G7 to discuss measures to protect the environment.

Mr. Waldegrave: Environmental issues were among the subjects discussed when the G7 countries met in Paris for the economic summit on 14 to 16 July 1989. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the then Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs accompanied the Prime Minister to that meeting.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Sainsbury: Seven such officials have attended courses specifically on information technology: this represents 23 per cent. of those relevant grades serving in both the diplomatic service and Overseas Development Administration wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Other officers in these grades have undertaken courses containing an element of information technology, but this information is not readily available.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Sainsbury: In both the diplomatic service and Overseas Development Administration wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, at home and abroad, there is an approximate total of 2,800 work stations (computer terminals), excluding stand-alone work processors. The ratio of these to United Kingdom civil servants is three civil servants to one terminal, but many of the overseas terminals are used by locally engaged staff and the ratio (including both United Kingdom and locally engaged staff) is 5:1

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Sainsbury: The day-to-day management of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's information technology (IT) strategy is the responsibility of officials. The Ministers with overall responsibility for IT matters in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are my noble Friend Lord Brabazon of Tara in the diplomatic service wing, and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Overseas Development. It would not be practicable to calculate what specific portion of a Minister's time is devoted to IT issues, since IT is now so well integrated into the Department's general business functions.

Porpoises

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Japanese Government in protest at the slaughter of 40,000 porpoises by Japanese fishermen in 1988.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have, through the International Whaling Commission made the Japanese Government fully aware of our view that there should be better international protection for porpoises and other species of small cetacea. We are investigatng reports of the slaughter to which the hon. Member refers.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Balance of Payments

12. Mr. Sillars: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the expected balance of payments deficit in the current year.

Mr. Lilley: A revised forecast will be published at the time of the Autumn Statement.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to reduce the deficit in the United Kingdom's balance of payments.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Tighter monetary policy is already slowing the growth of demand, and this will eventually lead to a reduction in the current account deficit. However, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has always made clear that the current account would be one of the last indicators to respond to the tightening of monetary policy.

52. Mr. George: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom's balance of payments deficit in the first quarter and second quarter of 1989.

56. Mr. Ted Garrett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom's balance of payments deficit in the first quarter and second quarter of 1989.

157. Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom's balance of payments deficit in the first quarter and second quarter of 1989.

184. Mr. John Garrett To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom's balance of payments deficit in the first quarter and second quarter of the current year.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The deficit on the current account was £4·8 billion in the first quarter and £4·9 billion in the second quarter of 1989.

67. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has revised the forecast for the balance of payments in 1989 and 1990 since the Budget.

Mr. Norman Lamont: A revised forecast will be published at the time of the Autumn Statement.

Public Sector Debt

13. Mr. Hague: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effect on debt interest costs of the public sector debt repayments over the last two years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Government have made a net public sector debt repayment of £17·9 billion over the last two years, saving over £1½ billion a year in debt interest costs.

86. Mr. Couchman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effect on debt interest costs of the public sector debt repayments over the last two years.

111. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effect on debt interest costs of the public sector debt repayments over the last two years.

Mr. Ryder: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague).

Output

14. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for output per hour worked in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Japan and (c) Germany.

99. Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for output per hour worked in (a) United Kingdom, (b) Japan and (c) Germany.

Mr. Ryder: Recent estimates show that output per hour worked in the United Kingdom economy in 1986 was about 50 per cent. higher than in Japan and only 5 per cent. lower than in Germany.

Public Expenditure

15. Mr. Snape: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending outturn for (a) health and (b) education.

143. Mr. Soley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending outturn for (a) health and (b) education.

147. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending outturn for (a) health and (b) education.

171. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending outturn for (a) health and (b) education.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Estimates of outturn for 1989-90 will be published in the Autumn Statement.

18. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps the Treasury is taking to ensure adequate levels of efficiency and value for money in Her Majesty's Government's public expenditure programmes.

74. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps the Treasury is taking to ensure adequate levels of efficiency and value for money in Her Majesty's Government's public expenditure programmes.

82. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps the Treasury is taking to ensure adequate levels of efficiency and value for money in Her Majesty's Government's public expenditure programmes.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Improving efficiency and value for money in public expenditure is a major Treasury objective, and the measures we have introduced have so far achieved estimated savings approaching £3 billion.

46. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending planning total for 1989-90.

54. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the public spending planning total.

87. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the public expenditure planning total.

185. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending planning total for 1989-90.

186. Mr. Rogers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending planning total for 1989-90.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson).

47. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress about the level of public expenditure.

97. Dr. Bray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress about the level of public expenditure.

124. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress about the level of public expenditure.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend receives representations from the CBI and the TUC from time to time concerning the level of public expenditure.

109. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the planning total for public spending in each of the next three years.

163. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the planning total for public spending in each of the next three years.

168. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the planning total for public spending in each of the next three years.

179. Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the planning total for public spending in each of the next three years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The public expenditure planning totals published in the 1989 public expenditure White Paper in January were £179·4 billion for 1990-91 and £191·6 billion for 1991-92; no planning total was set for 1992-93. Plans for all three years will be given in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's forthcoming Autumn Statement.

127. Mr. McLeish: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending outturn for 1989-90.

140. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending outturn for 1989-90.

153. Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending outturn for 1989-90.

155. Mr. Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the public spending outturn for 1989-90.

Mr. Norman Lamont: An estimate of outturn for 1989-90 will be published in the Autumn Statement.

138. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met representatives of the Equal Opportunities Commission concerning priorities for public expenditure in 1990-91.

180. Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met representatives of the Equal Opportunities Commission concerning priorities for public expenditure in 1990-91.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend has never met the Equal Opportunities Commission to discuss public expenditure.

New Businesses

19. Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the increase in the number of weekly net business start-ups in 1988-89 over 1987-88.

Mr. Lawson: In 1988, the number of new businesses started up, net of closures, averaged 1,200 a week, the highest level ever. The comparable figure for 1987 was 800 a week. In 1978, the last year of the last Labour Government, closures exceeded start-ups at the rate of 100 a week.

80. Mr. Walden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the increase in the number of weekly net business start-ups in 1988-89 over 1987-88.

158. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the increase in the number of weekly net business start-ups in 1988-89 over 1987-88.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo).

Tax Rates

20. Mr. Oakes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many bands of marginal income tax rates exist (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in other G7 countries.

61. Mr. Maxton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many bands of marginal income tax rates exist (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in other G7 countries.

121. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many bands of marginal income tax rates exist (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in other G7 countries.

125. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many bands of marginal income tax rates exist (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in other G7 countries.

Mr. Lilley: The United Kingdom has two bands of income tax rates. The number of bands in the other Group of Seven countries ranges from two to 12. With permission, I will place details in the Official Report.

Following is the information:

Table of Income tax rate bands

Country	Number of bands
Canada	[1]3
France	12
Federal Republic of Germany	[2]3
Italy	7
Japan	5
United States of America	[3]2

[1]Plus provincial tax: Quebec 5 bands, others 3 bands.
[2]The middle band is a gradually rising rate according to a table which has 2,260 stages.
[3]With an additional marginal rate band for some. Plus state income tax: e.g. California 6 bands, New York 5 bands.

Interest Rates

22. Mr. James Lamond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current short-term United Kingdom interest rate; and what are the interest rates of each of the G7 countries.

Mr. Norman Lamont: On 18 October three-month money market rates were 15 per cent. in the United Kingdom, 8·6 per cent. in the United States, 6·4 per cent. in Japan, 8·3 per cent. in Germany, 10 per cent. in France, 13 per cent. in Italy, and 12·3 per cent. in Canada.

27. Mr. Knox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the current level of interest rates.

102. Mr. Wilson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of interest rates.

Mr. Ryder: Bank base rates are 15 per cent.

30. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the United Kingdom base rate was in May 1988; and what is is today.

31. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the United Kingdom base rate was in May 1988; and what it is today.

57. Mr. Parry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom base rate in May 1988; and what it is today.

Mr. Ryder: The base rate in the United Kingdom was 8 per cent. at the beginning of May 1988 and fell to 7½ per cent. on 18 May of that year. The base rate is currently 15 per cent.

41. Mr. Janner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current short-term interest rate in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Germany.

135. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current short-term interest rate in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Germany.

149. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current short-term interest rate in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Germany.

Mr. Ryder: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie).

85. Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, what is the current short-term United Kingdom interest rate; and what are the interest rates of each of the G7 countries.

95. Mr. Lewis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current short-term United Kingdom interest rate; and what are the interest rates of each of the G7 countries.

130. Mr. Leighton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current short-term United Kingdom interest rate; and what are the interest rates of each of the G7 countries.

Mr. Ryder: I refer the hon. Members to the reply my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond).

105. Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he next expects to meet representatives of the Building Societies Association to discuss the level of United Kingdom interest rates.

118. Mr. Bell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet representatives of the Building Societies Association to discuss the level of United Kingdom interest rates.

120. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet representatives of the Building Societies Association to discuss the level of United Kingdom interest rates.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend has no such plans.

110. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the prevailing level of interest rates and the effect on manufacturing industry.

Mr. Ryder: Inflation is the greatest threat to the prosperity of all manufacturing firms. They will, therefore, benefit greatly from the Government's determination to keep interest rates as high as necessary for as long as necessary as part of its firm anti-inflationary policy.

114. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the effect to date of the high interest rate policy on countering inflation.

Mr. Ryder: There are clear signs that the Government's tight monetary policy is countering inflationary pressures. The housing market has cooled in all areas of the country and retail sales show the lowest recorded annual increase since June 1982.

116. Mr. David Young: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many letters he has received from members of the public on the level of interest rates or their impact on the cost of mortgages.

129. Mrs. Wise: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many letters he has recieved from members of the public on the level of interest rates or their impact on the cost of mortgages.

Mr. Ryder: I refer the hon. Members to the answer my right hon. Friend the Chancellor gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington).

156. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses Ltd. about the level of the United Kingdom's interest rates.

164. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the National Federation of Small Businesses and the self-employed about the level of United Kingdom interest rates.

166. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses Ltd. about the level of United Kingdom interest rates.

182. Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses Ltd. about the level of United Kingdom interest rates.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of representations on this subject.

Contingency Reserve

23. Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on allocations from the contingency reserve in the current financial year.

68. Mr. Boateng: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on allocations from the contingency reserve in the current financial year.

76. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on allocations from the contingency reserve in the current financial year.

92. Mr. Bradley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on allocations from the contingency reserve in the current financial year.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Allocations from the reserve are made as the need arises.

Income Tax

24. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his policy objectives for income tax.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend's objective is to reduce the basic rate of income tax to 20 per cent. as soon as it is prudent and sensible to do so.

Quotas

25. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the Government's response to the International Monetary Fund's proposals by Mr. Michael Camdessus for a quota increase.

Mr. Ryder: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams).

Private Sector Investment

26. Mr. Amos: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total value of United Kingdom private sector investment over the last three years as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Private sector fixed investment, in 1985 prices, as a percentage of gross domestic product (at factor cost) was 15·6 per cent. in 1986, 16·8 per cent. in 1987 and 19 per cent. in 1988. The share of private sector investment in GDP was a record in 1988, surpassing the previous record in 1987.

Value Added Tax

28. Dr. Reid: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to broaden the value added tax base.

73. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to broaden the value added tax base.

83. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to broaden the value added tax base.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend has no current plans to broaden the value added tax base.

34. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much value added tax for a family on average male earnings with two children represented as a percentage of their gross earnings in 1978-79; and what percentage it represents at the latest available date.

59. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much value added tax for a family on average male earnings with two children represented as a percentage of their gross earnings in 1978-79; and what percentage it represents at the latest available date.

65. Mr. John Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much value added tax for a family on average male earnings with two children represented as a percentage of their gross earnings in 1978-79; and what percentage it represents at the latest available date.

72. Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much value added tax for a family on average male earnings with two children represented as a percentage of their gross earnings in 1978-79; and what percentage it represents at the latest available date.

Mr. Ryder: A married man on average male earnings with two children would have paid approximately 2·7 per cent. of his earnings in value added tax in 1978-79 and will pay 5 per cent. in 1989-90.

Taxation

29. Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much indirect taxation has increased as a proportion of disposable income in real terms since 1984.

Mr. Ryder: It is estimated that indirect taxes—excluding rates—will be equivalent to 11·9 per cent. of gross national disposable income in 1989 compared with 11·8 per cent. in 1984.

77. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on progress towards the introduction of independent taxation in April 1990.

Mr. Lilley: Preparations are well in hand for the introduction of independent taxation in April 1990.

Third World Debt

32. Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met ministerial colleagues in the G7 to discuss Third world debt.

40. Mr. Strang: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met ministerial colleagues in the G7 to discuss Third world debt.

48. Mr. Turner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met ministerial colleagues in the G7 to discuss Third world debt.

132. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met with the managing director of the International Monetary Fund and the president of the World Bank to discuss Third world debt.

146. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met with the managing director of the International Monetary Fund and the president of the World Bank to discuss Third world debt.

178. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met the managing director of the International Monetary Fund and the president of the World Bank to discuss Third world debt.

Mr. Ryder: I refer the hon. Members to the answer my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor).

Inflation

33. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent steps he has taken to control the rate of inflation.

Mr. Ryder: Since the signs of emerging inflationary pressures appeared last year, the Chancellor has tightened monetary policy by raising interest rates. This is the right way to bring inflation down.

36. Mr. Alton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present rate of inflation in the United Kindom and in each other European Community country.

Mr. Ryder: Inflation rates for United Kingdom and all other EC countries are as follows. The figures exclude estimates of owner-occupier housing costs, putting them on a more comparable basis.

	Latest[1] inflation rate
Germany	2·8
France	3·4
United Kingdom	5·8
Italy	6·6
Spain	7·4
Netherlands	0·8
Belgium	3·2
Portugal	13·7
Greece	13·6
Denmark	4·9
Ireland	3·7
Luxembourg	3·4

[1] Latest figures are September for Italy and the United Kingdom, August for France, Germany, Belgium, Denmark, Greece, Luxembourg and Portugal, May for Ireland and July for the remaining countries.

Source: OECD HMT and national sources.

44. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the forecast used for inflation for 1989-90 and 1990-91 in the 1989 "Public Expenditure Survey"; and what are his latest estimates for inflation in these periods.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the forecast used for inflation for 1989-90 and 1990-91 used in the 1989 public expenditure survey; and what are his latest estimates for inflation in these periods.

126. Mr. Michael: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the forecast used for inflation for 1989-90 and 1990-91 used in the 1989 public expenditure survey; and what are his latest estimates for inflation in these periods.

Mr. Ryder: Estimates from the 1989 public expenditure survey will appear in the Autumn Statement. The statement will also present the latest general economic forecast, which includes projections for inflation.

Manufacturing Investment

35. Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest information on the investment intentions of British manufacturing industry.

113. Mr. Harris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest information on the investment intentions of British manufacturing industry.

181. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest information on the investment intentions of British manufacturing industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest Department of Trade and Industry investment intentions survey, published in June, projected manufacturing investment in constant prices to rise by 15 per cent. in 1989 on a year earlier, with a further, smaller, increase indicated for 1990.

Corporation Tax

37. Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration he has given to exempting non-quoted companies from corporation tax.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend has no plans to exempt non-quoted companies from corporation tax.

Business Investment

38. Mr. Hind: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of business investment for the latest full year for which figures are available.

167. Mr. Wood To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of business investment for the latest full year for which figures are available.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Business investment, in constant prices, as a percentage of gross domestic product was 14·9 per cent. in 1988, the highest level recorded.

Debt Reduction

39. Ms. Gordon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made in implementing the debt reduction plan of United States Treasury Secretary, Mr. Nicholas Brady.

Mr. Ryder: The IMF has agreed programmes allowing for officially supported debt reduction with Mexico, Venezuela, Costa Rica and the Philippines; and these countries are currently in discussion with the commercial banks on the terms of possible debt relief.

55. Dr. Gilbert: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made in implementing the debt reduction plan of United States Treasury Secretary, Mr. Nicholas Brady.

Mr. Lawson: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply which my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Ms. Gordon)

Trade Deficit

42. Mr. Faulds: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the deficit in visible trade in the first and second quarters of 1989.

91. Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the deficit in visible trade in the first and second quarters of 1989.

94. Mr. Terry Fields: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the deficit in visible trade in the first and second quarters of 1989.

101. Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the deficit in visible trade in the first and second quarters of 1989.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The deficit on visible trade was £6 billion in the first quarter and £5·9 billion in the second quarter of 1989.

93. Mr. Eadie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the deficit in manufacturing trade in the first and second quarters of 1989.

103. Mr. Harry Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the deficit in manufacturing trade in the first and second quarter of the current year.

106. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the deficit in manufacturing trade in the first and second quarters of 1989.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information was published on 26 September 1989 in table 16 of the monthly press notice on the current account of the balance of payments, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Negative Transfers

43. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the negative transfer of financial resources from the 17 most heavily indebted countries since 1983 to the latest available year.

134. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the negative transfer of financial resources from the 17 most heavily indebted countries since 1983 to the latest available year.

Mr. Ryder: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant).

Disposable Income

45. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for the growth of real personal disposable income for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In the four quarters up to the second quarter of 1989, real personal disposable income is estimated to have been 4·8 per cent. higher than in the year up to the second quarter of 1988.

Investment

49. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average annual increase in total investment in the United Kingdom in the 1980s; and what are the equivalent figures for the other European Community countries.

88. Mr. David Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average annual increase in total investment in the United Kingdom in the 1980s; and what are the equivalent figures for the other European Community countries.

172. Mr. Key: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average annual increase in total investment in the United Kingdom in the 1980s; and what are the equivalent figures for the other European Community countries.

177. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average annual increase in total investment in the United Kingdom in the 1980s; and what are the equivalent figures for the other European Community countries.

Mr. Ryder: The information is as follows:

Percentage increase in Total Gross Fixed Capital Formation 1980–88

	Annual average percentage change
Germany	0·5
France	0·8
United Kingdom	4·5
Italy	1·3
Belgium	0·4
Luxembourg	−0·1
Netherlands	2·0
Denmark	1·3
Ireland	−1·6
Spain	3·7
Portugal	2·5
Greece	−1·4

Manufacturing Output

50. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for growth of manufacturing output.

150. Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for the growth of manufacturing output.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest figures show that in the three months to August manufacturing output was 4 per cent. higher than a year earlier.

Footwear and Leather

51. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what fiscal assistance he is proposing to give to the footwear and leather industries.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend has no plans to introduce any special fiscal assistance for the footwear and leather industries.

Economic Growth

53. Sir David Price: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average annual rate of real economic growth in the United Kingdom through the 1980's.

69. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average annual rate of economic growth in the United Kingdom in the 1980s.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Gross domestic product is estimated to have grown on average by 2¼ per cent. per annum since 1980. The seven years to 1988 have seen a combination of strong and steady growth not matched since the war.

Employee Share Ownership

58. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what evidence he has of the amount of use being made by companies of employee share ownership plans as a result of the measures announced in his March Budget.

Mr. Lilley: The employee share ownership measures included in this year's Finance Act were generally welcomed, and we are confident that they will contribute to the continuing success of our initiatives in this field. While it is too early to assess their impact, the Inland Revenue has received a number of inquiries concerning the establishment of employee share ownership plans (ESOPs).

Personal Equity Plans

60. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what evidence he has of the level of take-up of personal equity plans as a result of the measures announced in his March Budget.

187. Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate how many personal equity plans have been taken out in the period since the 1989 Budget; and how many were taken out in the corresponding period last year.

Mr. Lilley: About 130,000 plans were started between the Budget and the end of September 1989 compared with about 35,000 for the corresponding period in 1988.

Bank of England

62. Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met the Governor of the Bank of England; and what was discussed.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend meets the Governor of the Bank of England from time to time to discuss a variety of matters.

Child Poverty

63. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet representatives of the Child Poverty Action Group to discuss child poverty.

75. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet representatives of the Child Poverty Action Group to discuss child poverty.

142. Ms. Abbott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet representatives of the Child Poverty Action Group to discuss child poverty.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Members to the reply my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett).

Imports and Exports

64. Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the rate of growth of exports over the last 10 years; and what has been the rate of growth of imports.

70. Ms. Quin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the rate of growth of exports over the last 10 years; and what has been the rate of growth of imports.

71. Mr. Randall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the rate of growth of exports over the last 10 years; and what has been the rate of growth of imports.

Mr. Norman Lamont: On a balance of payments basis, United Kingdom export volume in 1988 is estimated to have been 39 per cent. higher than in 1978. The corresponding estimate of the growth of imports is 70 per cent.

Directors (Pay)

66. Mr. Morley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in his discussions with the Director-General of the Confederation of British Industry, he has raised the subject of pay rises awarded to directors of companies in 1989.

78. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in his discussions with the Director-General of the Confederation of British Industry, he has raised the subject of pay rises awarded to directors of companies in 1989.

Dr. Moonie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in his discussions with the Director-General of the Confederation of British Industry, he has raised the subject of pay rises awarded to directors of companies in 1989.

123. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in his discussions with the Director-General of the Confederation of British Industry, he has raised the subject of pay rises awarded to directors of companies in 1989.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Pay is a matter for the parties involved to decide and it is not for the Government to intervene. This applies no matter whose pay is involved. But the Chancellor has made it clear that he will neither directly nor indirectly bail out employers who concede excessive wage settlements.

Privatisation

79. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received from institutions in the City on privatisation issues.

89. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received from institutions in the City on privatisation issues.

144. Mr. Coleman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received from institutions in the City on privatisation issues.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend receives a number of representations from time to time from institutions in the City on privatisation issues.

84. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimate of privatisation revenue.

122. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimate of privatisation revenue.

Mr. Lilley: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall).

International Debt

81. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next intends to discuss international debt with other finance ministers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is regularly in contact with Finance Ministers from other countries. I refer the hon. Member to my answer earlier today to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes).

Manufacturing Profitability

90. Mr. Ward: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the increase in manufacturing profitability during the latest full year for which figures are available.

148. Mr. Cash: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the increase in manufacturing profitability during the latest full year for which figures are available.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The net real rate of return on capital employed for manufacturing companies is estimated to be 9 per cent. in 1987, compared with 7½ per cent. in 1986.

IMF Meeting

96. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his recent meeting in Washington with the International Monetary Fund.

131. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the recent annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: Finance Ministers of the major industrialised countries reaffirmed their support for economic policy co-operation, leading to low inflation and exchange rate stability. Strong support was given for plans to establish open, market-based economies, particularly in eastern Europe.

Ministers endorsed the strengthened debt strategy, developed by the fund and bank since the spring interim and development committee meetings, and welcomed the first cases of debt reduction which have been agreed.

No agreement was reached on the IMF's quota review: a decision is envisaged by the end of 1989.

Copies of the meeting communiqués have been placed in the Library.

154. Mr. Ashley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the recent annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell).

Investment and Consumption

98. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the growth of (a) total investment and (b) total consumption over the past seven years.

136. Mr. Heddle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the growth of (a) total investment and (b) total consumption over the past seven years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Total investment grew by 76 per cent. in volume terms between 1981 and 1988. Over the same period, the volume of total domestic final consumption grew by 26 per cent. These estimates are derived from information in the CSO's "United Kingdom National Accounts", 1989 edition.

Labour Statistics

100. Mr. Franks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much total employment has risen since 1983.

Mr Norman Lamont: Total employment has increased by 2,793,000 since March 1983.

115. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much adult unemployment has fallen over the last three years.

139. Mr. Mans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much adult unemployment has fallen over the last three years.

183. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much adult unemployment has fallen over the last three years.

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much adult unemployment has fallen over the last three years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Adult seasonally adjusted unemployment fell by 1,419,300 during the three years to September 1989.

Mr. Cran: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest figure for the total number of people in work; and what was the figure 10 years ago.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest figures, released this morning, show that the total number of people in work in the United Kingdom was 26,357,000 in June 1989. This is a new record. In June 1979 total employment was 24,987,000.

Tax Cuts

108. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the economic impact of top rate tax cuts.

112. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the economic impact of top rate tax cuts.

117. Mr Loyden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the economic impact of top rate tax cuts.

119. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the economic impact of top rate tax cuts.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The economic impact of top rate tax cuts, like that of any cuts in income tax, is to promote enterprise, discourage tax avoidance and retain talent in this country.

World Bank Meetings

128. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the recent annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank; and if he will make a statement.

133. Mr. Wells: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his recent meeting in Washington with the World Bank.

Mr. Ryder: I refer the hon. Members to the communiqués issued by the interim committee of the IMF and the joint development committee of the IMF and the World Bank, which can be found in the Library of the House.

OECD

137. Mr. Clelland: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which countries have overtaken the United Kingdom in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's list of the leading industrial economies in the last three years.

169. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which countries have overtaken the United Kingdom in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's list of the leading industrial economies in the last three years.

174. Mr. Clay: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which countries have overtaken the United Kingdom in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's list of the leading economies in the last three years.

Mr. Ryder: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 27 July 1989 at column 1125.

151. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom's position in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development ranking of the largest industrial economies in december 1988 and in June 1989.

152. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom's position in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development ranking of the largest industrial economies in December 1988 and in June 1989.

175. Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom's position in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development ranking of the largest industrial economies in December 1988 and in June 1989.

176. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the United Kingdom's position in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development ranking of the largest industrial economies in December 1988 and in June 1989.

Mr. Ryder: From June 1989 the United Kingdom is sixth in the OECD's ranking of the leading industrial economies after Italy. The OECD ordering is based on GDP in an earlier year converted at market exchange rates. On the basis of a GDP comparison using OECD estimates of purchasing power parities, the United Kingdom would come before Italy in both 1987 and 1988.

Workplace Nurseries

141. Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to meet representatives of the workplace nurseries campaign.

161. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has plans to meet representatives of the workplace nurseries campaign.

173. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has plans to meet representatives of the workplace nurseries campaign.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so.

162. Mr. Denis Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has plans to meet representatives of the workplace nurseries campaign.

Mr. Lawson: I have no plans to do so.

Gross Domestic Product

145. Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his latest figures for the growth of gross domestic product on an output basis; and what are the comparable figures for other members of the European Community.

Mr. Ryder: Not all EC countries publish GDP on an output basis. The output measure of GDP at constant factor cost for the United Kingdom increased by 4·7 per cent. in 1988. GDP at constant prices grew more quickly in only two other EC countries, Luxembourg and Spain.

Funding Policy

159. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the Government's present funding policy.

Mr. Ryder: The Government's funding policy is set out in paragraph 2.23 to 2.26 of the 1989-90 "Financial Statement and Budget Report".

Economic Policy

160. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet representatives of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss United Kingdom economic policy.

170. Mr. Anderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet representatives of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss United Kingdom economic policy.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend meets representatives of the CBI from time to time, and a wide range of subjects are discussed.

165. Mr. Archer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet representatives of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss United Kingdom economic policy.

Mr. Lawson: I refer the right hon. and learned Member to the answer given earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong).

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Ryder: Since promotion to the level of grade 3, two Treasury officials have attended courses exclusively on information technology (IT) and 13 have attended courses containing IT sessions. This represents attendance rates of 4·4 per cent. and 31 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Ryder: The Treasury which includes the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency, Chessington computer centre and the Civil Service Catering Organisation, has 1,430 computer work stations. The overall ratio of work stations to staff is about 1:2·2. This figure includes all terminals and microcomputers, but excludes stand-alone dedicated work processors.

Drug Seizures

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the latest quantities of cannabis and crack seized by Customs cutters and waterguard officers.

Mr. Ryder: The provisional figures for the six-month period comencing 1 April 1989, uniformed officers on preventive duties (formerly known as the Waterguard) seized 13,385[1] kilos of Cannabis, mostly cannabis resin, out of a total of 18,951[1] kilos seized by Customs.

The cutter service was involved in three large seizures of cannabis, one of 1,200 kilos and two of 100 kilos each.

"Crack" is a compound of cocaine hydrochloride mixed with baking soda/ammonia/amphetamine, and although Customs made no commercial quantity seizures of it, they did seize 118[1] kilos of the main ingredient Cocaine.

[1] All figures are provisional.

Civil Service Dispersal

Mr. Hind: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to relocate any executive agencies or parts of Government Departments in the north-west of England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: Under the policy announced by my right hon. Friend, the then Paymaster General on 31 March 1988, all Government Departments, including executive agencies, are required to review the location of their work in accordance with clear guidelines, with a view to finding locations offering easier labour markets, value for money and increased operational efficiency. It is for departmental Ministers to announce their own decisions on significant relocations on completion of the essential processes of assessment and consultation. So far this year, decisions have been taken to relocate around 775 Department of Employment posts to Runcorn; 260 Department of Social Security posts to Wigan; 250 Office of Population Censuses and Surveys posts to Southport; 200 Customs and Excise posts to Liverpool and around 80 Inland Revenue posts to Bootle.

HEALTH

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Freeman: Twenty-seven (55 per cent.) of the 49 officials at grade 3 or above have attended courses specifically on information technology since their promotion to the level of grade 3. Of the remaining 22 officials, three (6 per cent.) have attended courses with an element of information technology.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Freeman: The Department of Health has 1,032 work stations in use. The ratio of work stations to staff is 1 for every 3·13 staff.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Freeman: The day-to-day management of the Department of Health's information technology (IT) strategy is the responsibility of officials. I am responsible for oversight of IT matters in the Department of Health. IT is in general so integrated into the Department's business functions that to attempt to apportion specific intervals of my time to its consideration would involve a disproportionate effort to obtain.

Tranquillisers

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase the amount of moneys available to health authorities specifically for the development of services for those experiencing problems with drugs, including prescribed drugs such as tranquillisers.

Mr. Freeman: Allocations for regional health authorities specifically earmarked for the development of services for drug misusers including those dependent on prescribed tranquillisers have increased each year since the initial allocation of £5 million in 1986-87.

Regional allocations in 1989-90 for this purpose totalled £14·8 million, an increase of £5·3 million over the sum allocated in 1988-89.

Decisions on allocations to health authorities for 1990-91 have yet to be taken.

Benzodiazepines

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prescriptions for benzodiazepines were issued by community pharmacists in the United Kingdom during 1988.

Mr. Mellor: The number of prescriptions for benzodiazepines dispensed by community pharmacists in Great Britain in 1988 was 23·2 million. This was 9 per cent. fewer than in 1987.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what response he has made to the report by the Association of Community Health Councils on benzodiazepines.

Mr. Freeman: We are aware of the report on benzodiazepines produced by the association. The report succinctly and usefully summarises the problems associated with tranquilliser dependence and suggests some solutions.

The Department shares the association's concern about long-term benzodiazepine dependence. It is tackling the problem both by ensuring doctors have all the guidance they need for careful prescribing of these drugs and by allocating additional resources for the expansion of services for drug misusers including those dependent on prescribed tranquillisers.

Teaching Hospitals

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the costs of London area teaching hospitals have been excluded from the normal financing of their health authorities; if the costs of teaching hospitals outside London have been included; and what is the comparative value of this arrangement to the London authorities.

Mr. Freeman: A contribution to the costs of teaching hospitals is provided in addition to main allocations, to all regional health authorities with teaching hospitals. This contribution is enhanced for the four Thames regions to take account of the costs of London weighting and other additional London costs. The total sum protected in 1989-90 in respect of the excess costs of teaching hospitals was £316·4 million of which £11·7 million was for additional London areas costs.

It is a matter for regional health authorities to decide how to allocate these protected sums to districts with teaching hospitals.

Health Authorities (Funding)

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what additional funding will be given to health authorities to ensure that the national growth range of between 1·25 and 1·75 per cent. is maintained in view of the higher level of inflation than that forecast at the time of this commitment.

Mr. Freeman: The range of 1·25 per cent. to 1·75 per cent. to be assumed for real terms growth nationally in 1990-91, published in "Resource Assumptions and Planning Guidelines" (HC(89) 24), was provided to assist authorities in their short-term planning; the figures form a largely technical part of the planning process and are to be used as a basis for cautious and prudent planning. Actual allocations for 1990-91 have yet to be decided and are dependent on the outcome of this year's public expenditure survey.

Organ Transplants

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action his Department intends to take to improve the number of kidneys and other organs available for transplantation.

Mr. Freeman: Following advice from the conference of medical colleges, in December 1988 we issued guidance to health authorities on the provision of donor organs for transplantation; this is contained in health circular HC(88) 63. We have also substantially increased the proportion of the Department's publicity budget which is devoted to organ donation.

In November I will be hosting a seminar at which an invited group of experts and interested parties will discuss what further action may be needed.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated annual cost for each of the last five years of community health councils.

Mr. Freeman: The expenses of community health councils are met by and form part of the total expenditure of the health authorities concerned. The latest information available derived from health authorities' annual accounts is shown in the table.

Year	£
1983-84	6,098,626
1984-85	6,341,305
1985-86	6,784,064
1986-87	7,164,552
1987-88	7,506,998

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his reply of 25 May, Official Report, column 744, concerning the cost of the common agricultural policy, whether he will publish in the Official Report his estimate of the increase in the cost of agricultural support to the average consumer in 1988 compared with the year taken by the National Consumer Council in "Consumers and the Common Agricultural Policy" published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in 1988.

Mr. Curry: The National Consumer Council report referred to several assessments of consumer costs of the common agricultural policy undertaken by different researchers. As far as I am aware, only OECD has published estimates for 1988. Provisional estimates for Consumer Subsidy Equivalent's (CSE) for the European Community are shown up on pages 96 and 161 of "Agricultural Policies, Markets and Trade: Monitoring and Outlook" (OECD, 1989), available in the Library of the House. The consumer cost, as measured by the CSE for the European Community, fell by around one fifth between 1986 and 1988.

The OECD estimates take no account of the possible increases in world prices if agricultural support in the European Community, and throughout the world, were dismantled: to this extent they are likely significantly to overstate consumer costs.

The Government's aim is to achieve lower levels of agricultural support worldwide, thereby reducing the costs borne by consumers and taxpayers and establishing fair competition between producers.

CAP Products

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1970, 1979 and 1988, United Kingdom production of each of the principal common agricultural policy products, including bacon, rice and cotton, together with the quantities imported from and exported to (a) the European Economic Community and (b) the rest of the world; and if he will include the average 1988 price of the imports and exports in each case together with the common agriculture policy price.

Mr. Curry: Information on production and trade for the earlier years is shown in the "Annual Review of Agriculture" White Papers (the 1981 review, Cmnd 8132, provides averaged data for the years 1969-71 and the 1984 review, Cmnd 9137, covers 1979). Forecasts for 1988 were published in "Agriculture in the United Kingdom 1988", ISBN 011 242 8665. Production estimates for 1988 will be available in the 1989 edition (to be published early in the new year). Provisional data on overseas trade in 1988 is to be found in the December 1988 edition of the "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom", ISBN 011 728 2642.

EC institutional prices, together with their sterling equivalents, are given each year in the note on the annual price fixing deposited in the Library of the House.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Brussels Agriculture Council held on 25 and 26 September.

Mr. Gummer: The Council of Agriculture Ministers met on 25 and 26 September 1989. Together with my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting.

The Council adopted the legal text confirming its provisional agreement in July to a revised sheepmeat regime, including arrangements for phasing out variable premium in Great Britain between 1990 and 1992.

The Council also agreed new arrangements for New Zealand butter and lamb imports. Imports of New Zealand butter will be set at 64,500 tonnes in 1989, falling to 55,000 tonnes in 1992, with a substantial reduction in the import levy. With the agreement of the New Zealand

Government imports of New Zealand lamb have been set at 205,000 tonnes; this includes a maximum of 6,000 tonnes of chilled meat in 1989 rising to 10,500 tonnes by 1992. The import duty will be reduced from 10 per cent. to 0. These arrangements follow the terms negotiated some months ago between the Commission and New Zealand.

The Council agreed to changes in the system for reimbursement from the Community budget of national expenditure on set-aside. Under these, the Community will fund 60 per cent. of payments up to 300 ecus (£212) and 25 per cent. of payments between 300 and 600 ecus (£424) per hectare. The overall level of set-aside payment in the United Kingdom is not affected.

The Council discussed again the Commission proposal to permit all member states to issue an extra 1 per cent. of national quota to certain categories of producers and to make other changes to the milk quota system, designed to bring down the volume of production in excess of quota. No decisions were reached, and the Council will return to this subject on 23 and 24 October.

The Commission again came under strong pressure to make a determination of the Community cereals harvest so that the definitive level of the additional co-responsibility levy for the current marketing year could be set. The Commission indicated that it intended to make such a determination in the course of October. The Commission presented to the Council a proposal that would permit any inaccurate provisional determination of the Community harvest to be corrected; any error in the rate of the additional co-responsibility levy arising from an inaccurate provisional determination would be corrected in the following year. This proposal will be considered further on 23 and 24 October.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Curry: The day-to-day management of the Ministry's information technology (IT) strategy is the responsibility of officials. I am the Minister responsible for oversight of IT matters in the Department. IT is in general so integrated into the Department's business functions that to attempt to apportion specific intervals of a Minister's time to its consideration would involve a disproportionate effort to obtain.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Curry: Our formal records show that two officials in this Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended courses specifically on information technology. Thirteen have attended courses containing an element of information technology. This represents 6 per cent. and 38 per cent. of all the staff in those grades in the Department. In addition a number of senior officials have attended a selection of seminars/training sessions specifically on information technology, if appropriate to the area of work on which they are engaged. Attendances at these sessions is not formally recorded.

Many staff are, of course, already trained on information technology before achieving promotion to grade 3.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Curry: The Ministry currently has about 2,100 work stations (excluding stand-alone word processors) in use. This represents a 1:5 ratio of work stations to civil servants.

Commercial Whaling

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to support a continuation of the moratorium on commercial whaling beyond 1990.

Mr. Curry: The International Whaling Commission will review the moratorium next year in the light of the comprehensive scientific review of whale stocks which it is undertaking at present. The moratorium will continue indefinitely unless there is a three quarters majority decision to revoke it. We will need to see what the scientists say before taking a firm view on this matter. In line with our general policy if there are doubts we will err on the side of conservation.

Small Cetaceans

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if Her Majesty's Government intend to endorse the decision of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe to seek an extension of the powers of the International Whaling Commission to small cetaceans.

Mr. Curry: We have consistently argued that the International Whaling Commission should be regarded as having the power to regulate catches of all species of cetacea, from whales to dolphins and porpoises.

Fisheries Conservation

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to adopt economic sanctions against those countries which undermine international fisheries conservation agreements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The Government do not consider that they should promote the idea of economic sanctions. Rather we shall continue to work vigorously through the relevant forum of the International Whaling Commission to ensure that whales are properly conserved. It is widely recognised that we have had much success with this policy.

Salmon Fishing

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he is yet in a position to publish the findings of the review of the effects of the offshore driftnet salmon fishing on stocks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Work on the statutory review of the salmon net fisheries off the north-east of England and eastern Scotland is under way. Scientists from both my Department and the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland are currently collecting and co-ordinating a wide range of scientific information.

Ministers are required by section 39 of the Salmon Act 1986 to lay a report on the review before Parliament as soon as practicable after 6 November this year. Once completed, we will clearly need time to consider this extensive review carefully before we are in a position to present a full report to Parliament. I can confirm that it is our intention to do so as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Privatisation

199. Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the costs to the Treasury of advertising the sale of the water authorities.

200. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the costs to the Treasury of advertising the sale of the water authorities.

201. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the costs to the Treasury of advertising the sale of the water authorities.

203. Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the costs to the Treasury of advertising the sale of the water authorities.

Mr. Howard: The costs of the flotation, including the advertising, will be released to Parliament in the usual way after the sale.

202. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the costs to the Treasury of the underwriting for the sale of the water authorities.

204. Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the costs to the Treasury of the underwriting for the sale of the water authorities.

205. Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the costs to the Treasury of the underwriting for the sale of the water authorities.

206. Mr. Cunliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the costs to the Treasury of the underwriting for the sale of the water authorities.

Mr. Howard: It is too early to say what the costs of underwriting will be, but these and the other costs of privatising the water industry will be reported to Parliament in due course in the normal way.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will (a) give details of overseas marketing and advertising campaigns paid for by his Department and organised by overseas advisers on water privatisation to attract investment in the flotation of the water industry and (b) state how much money has been spent and is proposed to be spent in each case.

Mr. Chris Patten: Shares will be marketed in Japan, Canada, the United States of America and several countries in Europe through presentations made to institutional investors by representatives of the water companies. In Japan only, factual information about the offers will be placed in a limited number of newspapers and there will be a mail shot of information about the offer to a number of private investors. The cost of all marketing, both United Kingdom and overseas, will be presented to Parliament in the usual way after flotation.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will be in a position to state for each country the size of the share offer in the water industry to be made.

Mr. Chris Patten: When the prospectus is published in late November.

Sea Pollution

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by water holding company area the number of sewage outfalls to the sea; and, of those, how many include primary treatment works.

Mr. Chris Patten: This information is available on National Rivers Authority registers but is not held centrally.

Committee Statistics

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the composition of (a) each regional rivers advisory committee, (b) each regional flood defence committee and (c) each regional fisheries advisory committee, showing for each member their age, sex and background leading to their being appointed to the committee; and which interests they represent.

Mr. Patten: The regional rivers advisory committees and the regional fisheries advisory committees are committees of the National Rivers Authority, and appointment to them are not made by Ministers but by the National Rivers Authority. I shall write to the hon. Member with information about the appointments that have been made so far.

The regional flood defence committees in England are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who appoints the chairman and some members of the committees; the majority of appointments are made by the local authorities in the regions, and two members of each committee are appointed by the National Rivers Authority.

Water Quality

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the numbers of staff and their grades so far appointed to the technical assessors of water quality within his Department; and what proportion this represents of the final number to be appointed.

Mr. Patten: No appointments have been made yet, but the nucleus of a new inspectorate should be in place by 1 January 1990 when the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 come fully into force.

Pollution Inspectorate

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of progress in reorganising Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside announced on 2 October that significant progress has been made in reorganising Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution to integrate its regulatory activities. The inspectorate will now operate on a regionalised basis. Full details are available in the Library. I am delighted with the progress made to date. This will ensure that we can secure the benefits of integrated pollution control as quickly as possible.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the total number of professional staff employed within the pollution inspectorate;

(2) if he will list the number of vacancies for professionals within the pollution inspectorate, showing in each case the grade and salary scale.

Mr. Chris Patten: HMIP employs 103 professional staff; an additional 28 professional posts are currently vacant. We shall shortly be advertising vacancies at a new grade of pollution inspector. A new salary scale has been proposed to staff representatives ranging from £20,238 to £26,910 (including London weighting). At the minimum of the scale this represents an increase of the 17·3 per cent. against current rates and of 28·5 per cent. against rates offered at the last recruitment exercise.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what mechanism has been set up within his Department for liaison between the National Rivers Authority and Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

Mr. Chris Patten: A series of discussions has been held by my Department, involving both organisations, to define the basis of their future working relationship. Both the inspectorate and the National Rivers Authority recognise the need for close co-ordination at the interface between their respective responsibilities and will be drawing up a memorandum of understanding to cover these matters.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Chris Patten: Ten officials in the Department at grade 3 and above have attended a course specifically on information technology; and a further seven have attended a course containing an element of information technology. This represents respectively 18 per cent. and 12 per cent. of all staff in those grades in the Department.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Patten: About 1,950 in the Department of the Environment (excluding the Property Services Agency); a ratio of one work station to three members of staff. The figure includes all terminals, microcomputers, word processors (excluding stand-alone word processors) and portable text processors.

In the Property Services Agency (including the Crown Suppliers) there are some 2,370 work stations representing one for every 6·6 members of staff.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Patten: The day-to-day management of the information strategy in the Department of the Environment (Central) is undertaken by an information technology steering group. The chairman of this committee (a grade 3 civil servant) consults me or my ministerial colleagues as appropriate.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) is kept in touch with developments in the Property Services Agency, for which he is responsible.

Assured Tenancies

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many assured shorthold tenancies in the privately rented sector have been taken up in (a) the Greater London area and (b) the rest of the country since the legislation came into effect this year;

(2) how many new assured tenancies in the privately rented sector have been taken up in (a) the Greater London area and (b) the rest of the country since the legislation came into effect.

Mr. Chope: We intend in due course to undertake a full evaluation of the impact of the new private letting regime, and this should provide some information as to the number of assured and assured shorthold tenancies that have been created. At present, however, such information is not available.

Endangered Species

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contributions have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the CITES ivory unit in each year since 1985.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In 1986 and each succeeding year the United Kingdom contributed £5,000 towards the running of the CITES monitoring unit for trade in raw ivory.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has regarding payments made by ivory traders to the CITES ivory unit; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 25 May 1989, Official Report, Vol. 153, col. 677-78. Contributions to the ivory trade monitoring unit from ivory traders are made in response to a resolution passed at the 6th CITES conference held in July 1987, which urged Governments, non-governmental organisations, trade groups and other appropriate agencies to contribute to the secretariat for ivory trade control co-ordination activities.

Mr. Peter Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on payments received by the organisations concerned with the convention on trade in endangered species secured from the sale of illegally or improperly acquired species; and if he will support the call for an investigation of those allegations and of the organisations concerned.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: None. It is not therefore possible to say whether or not any such investigation would be appropriate.

Puffins

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has regarding the current British population of puffins; and if he will make it his policy to institute a ban on sand-eel fishing to encourage the breeding of puffins.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The current British population of puffins is estimated to be in excess of 500,000 breeding pairs. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, has already taken action to limit sand-eel fishing.

Environment Council

Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Environment Council on 19 September.

Mr. Chris Patten: I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting.

The Council gave broad support to a proposal to establish a European Environment Agency, with many member states, including the United Kingdom, offering to host it. Detailed work on technical, administrative and legal aspects of the proposal will now proceed urgently.

Political agreement was reached on a directive concerning the deliberate release to the environment of genetically modified organisms. The directive requires member states to establish systems for the national regulation of such releases where they are for the purposes of research and development and establishes a Community-wide information exchange scheme between national authorities. It also establishes a system for the review and clearance of products containing genetically modified organisms so that conditions can be established for their marketing throughout the Community. The principles embodied in the directive of review and clearance in advance of all releases are broadly compatible with the Department of Environment's consultation paper on future domestic legislation and the conclusions reached by the Royal Commission on environmental pollution in its report on the subject.

I am pleased to say that the United Kingdom received wide support for its call for industrialised nations to become self-sufficient in their waste disposal operations, with the aim of bringing to an end environmentally unjustified transfrontier movement of waste. There was general agreement on the need for Community action on waste, but a number of important issues in the draft framework directive, including scope and treaty base, remain to be resolved.

As a result of joint United Kingdom and Presidency pressure for early discussion of the subject, the Council considered the positive environmental labelling of consumer products. I am pleased to say that the Council agreed conclusions asking the Commission to bring forward proposals for a Community scheme of environmental labelling as quickly as possible.

The Council endorsed the proposal to list the African Elephant on appendix I of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (CITES) and agreed the arrangement for reaching the common positions of member states for the 7th meeting of the conference of the parties to the convention at Lausanne on 9-20 October.

An exchange of views took place on a Commission communication analysing the causes and consequences of tropical deforestation and presenting options for a Community strategy for the conservation of tropical forests. The Council welcomed the communication and agreed conclusions supporting certain forms of Community action in this field and calling for further examination of the communication.

The Council adopted a resolution aimed at preventing natural hazards and reducing dangers from potentially hazardous industrial activities and from transport of dangerous substances. The resolution called on the Commission to undertake studies and initiate measures to improve the prevention of such hazards within the Community.

The United Kingdom warmly supported Germany in strongly pressing the Commission to come forward with long-overdue proposals to curb emissions from diesel heavy goods vehicles.

Community Charge

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the cost of administering transitional relief, showing separately costs falling in (a) 1989-90, (b) 1990-91 and (c) later years.

Mr. Chris Patten [holding answer 18 October 1989]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 18 October, Official Report, Vol. 158, col. 155.

ENERGY

BNFL Sellafield

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy for how many individual facilities at BNFL Sellafield have (a) a facility attachment and (b) particular safeguards provisions been completed, in conjunction with (a) Euratom and (b) the International Atomic Energy Agency; when such arrangements were entered into force for each facility; and for what time period the arrangements are in force.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Four particular safeguard provisions for facilities at BNFL Sellafield are currently in force and will continue indefinitely. A further four are very close to implementation. The remainder are in various stages of consultation.

A facility attachment for one facility at Sellafield was agreed in 1980 and discussions have recently taken place on facility attachments for two other facilities.

Nuclear Plants (Accidents)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has recently taken, or plans to take, any policy decision on the collaboration of the United Kingdom with European Community partners to share knowledge and assistance in the circumstances of an accident involving radiation plants, nuclear fuel fabrication and enrichment plants, and in research reactors.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Government are currently involved in discussions within the Council of the European Communities on measures to increase co-operation and assistance between member states in the event of a nuclear accident or radiological emergency. These proposals are detailed in European Community Document COM (89) 25 Final. On 26 June 1989, I signed an explanatory memorandum about the proposals which was placed in the Vote Office.

Nuclear Power (Human Reliability)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if his Department will be participating in the conference on human reliability in nuclear power, to be held on 19 and 20 October.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Although my Department will not be participating in the conference directly, both the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, who advise the Secretary of State for Energy on nuclear matters, will be represented.

Pressurised Water Reactors

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if his Department will be represented at the conference on "The PWR—the present and future of Europe's Nuclear Energy" to be held on 6 and 7 November.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No departmental officials will attend the conference. I understand that officials of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate are intending to attend.

Environmental Protection

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what European Community directives and regulations on environmental protection in regard to the energy sector have not been implemented since May 1979; and what is the reason in each case for the non-implementation.

Mr. Wakeham: Responsibility for implementating EC directives and regulations on environmental protection rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. However, I am advised that the only directive relating mainly to environmental protection in regard to the energy sector not implemented since May 1979 is the Large Combustion Plants Directive (88/609/EEC). This was adopted by the European Community on 24 November 1988 and is to be implemented by 30 June 1990. On 31 August the Department of the Environment published the Government's proposals for implementing this directive.

Contaminated Soil (Harwell)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what work was undertaken over the summer to remove radioactivity contaminated soil from Harwell.

Mr. Michael Spicer: None.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Wakeham: There are 15 staff employed in the Department of Energy at grade 3 level and above. Of these, four have received training specifically on information technology since promotion, and three (including two of the four already mentioned) have attended courses containing an element of information technology. These figures represent 27 per cent. and 20 per cent. respectively of the total.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department currently has about 400 computer work stations, including stand-alone micro computers not entirely devoted to word processing, giving a ratio of 1:2·5 civil servants.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Wakeham: I am satisfied that my Department's information technology strategy is appropriate to its circumstances and that its implementation does not require the day-to-day involvement of Ministers.

Nuclear Reactors

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current operational difficulties with (a) Magnox and (b) advanced gas-cooled reactors.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This is an operational matter for the Central Electricity Generating Board. I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Oil Consumption

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the level of (a) world oil consumption and (b) United Kingdom oil consumption in each year since 1960; what has been the percentage annual growth in each case; and what levels are predicted to be reached by 2000.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Data on United Kingdom and non-Communist world oil consumption between 1960 and 1988 are shown in the table, together with annual percentage changes in each case.

Predictions of world and United Kingdom oil consumption over the next 10 years remain uncertain and will depend upon many different factors.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Earnings Rule (Abolition)

192. Sir George Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the implications of the abolition of the earnings rule.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Abolition of the earnings rule on 1 October means greater choice and flexibility for pensioners. Women aged 60 to 64, and men aged 65 to 69 no longer have their state pension reduced on account of earnings over £75 a week. They may now earn as much as they wish, work as many hours as they wish and still claim their full entitlement to the state pension. The removal of this disincentive to carry on working is expected to benefit approximately 200,000 people who previously deferred their state pension, as well as a further 200,000 who earn less than £75 a week and who may now choose to earn more.

National Insurance

193. Mr. Irvine: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has any further plans for reforming the structure of national insurance contributions.

194. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the implementation of the reform of national insurance.

Mr. Scott: The changes in the structure of national insurance contributions, announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget Statement, came into effect on Thursday 5 October 1989. Some 19 million employees will pay less in contributions as a result of these reforms. We have no current plans for further reform of the contributions system.

EC Labour and Social Affairs Council

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the European Community Labour and Social Affairs Council held in Brussels on 29 September.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I attended this Council on behalf of the United Kingdom. The meeting was very constructive. Ministers exchanged views on a number of wide-ranging items, including family policies and the possibility of a co-ordinated approach to the problems of disability. Agreement was reached on a resolution on possible measures for combating the social exclusion of disadvantaged groups. There was also some discussion of the social security provisions for workers moving between member states and of the need for extension of social protection schemes in fields such as occupational pensions.

Ministers agreed to support European Community study of the practicalities of introducing a durable plastic card version of form E111 (to obtain emergency health care in the EC).

Proposals for amending the family benefit provisions of the regulations (1408/71) dealing with social security benefits for migrant workers in the light of the European Court of Justice judgment in the Pinna case were agreed by 11 member states including the United Kingdom, but Italy maintained a reserve on the proposal, which needed unanimity. The issue was, therefore, deferred for further consideration.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Since their promotion to grade 3, nine people at grades 3 and above have attended a course specifically on information technology and six people have attended a course containing an element of information technology. This represents 53 per cent. and 35 per cent. respectively of all the staff in those grades.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There are currently 3,985 work stations installed within the Department as part of the operational strategy to computerise benefit payments. The ratio of work stations to civil servants is 1:20. The number of work stations will rise as the programme for the computerisation of benefits is introduced into more offices during national rollout.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which Minister in his Deprtment is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Newton: The day-to-day management of the Department of Social Security's information technology (IT) strategy is the responsibility of officials. The Minister responsible for oversight of IT matters in the Department of Social Security is the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard). IT is in general so integrated into the Department's business functions that to attempt to apportion specific intervals of my hon. Friend's time to its consideration would involve a disproportionate effort to obtain.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Road Accidents, Castlereagh

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many road accidents there have been on the road between Shaw's bridge and the Milltown junction with the dual carriageway in the borough of Castlereagh in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: There has been a total of 54 road accidents reported to the police in which injuries have been sustained on this stretch of road between 1 January 1984 and 3 July 1989. The figures for each year are:

	Number
1984	12
1985	10
1986	8
1987	7
1988	7
1989[1]	10

[1] To 3 July 1989.

No record is kept of road accidents in which there have been no injuries.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Cope: The number of staff at grade 3 and above in Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments who, since promotion to grade 3, have attended a course specifically on information technology is 14; and the number who have attended a course containing an element of information technology is five. These figures represent 28 per cent. and 10 per cent. respectively of the total number of staff in these grades.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Cope: The number of work stations, excluding stand-alone word processors, in the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments is 3,670. The ratio of work stations to non-industrial civil servants is 1:5·6.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Cope: While each Minister has departmental responsibilities which include information technology, I have specific responsibility for the Northern Ireland service-wide aspects of the Government's information technology strategy which are co-ordinated by the Department of Finance and Personnel.

A detailed record is not maintained of the time that I spend on my various responsibilities.

Grant-aided Schools

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions in each of the past 10 years the Department of Education exercised its power of direction in the case of managers of grant-aided schools for acting or proposing to act unreasonably in the discharge of their functions under the Education and Libraries (Northern Ireland) Orders.

Dr. Mawhinney: Two such directions have been issued to education and library boards in their capacity as the managers of controlled schools. No such directions have been issued to managers of voluntary grant-aided schools.

PRIME MINISTER

South Hams

Q19. Mr. Steen: To ask the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to South Hams.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has no plans to do so.

NATO

Q28. Mr. Cash: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding NATO.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister regularly receives representations regarding NATO.

Skills Training

Q29. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Prime Minister what recent representations she has received concerning skills training.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister receives representations from time to time. The Government, through their Training Agency, invest almost £3 billion in funding training. However, training is primarily the responsibility of employers, who are investing more than ever before in the skills of their employees—some £18 billion a year.

Fishing Vessels (Safety)

Q34. Dr. Godman: To ask the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government have any proposals to change the safety regulations relating to the occupational safety of fishermen and the safe working of United Kingdom registered fishing vessels; and if she will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The Fishing Vessel (Safety Provisions) Rules 1975 are currently under review. The review will take into account the provisions of the Torremolinos international convention for the safety of fishing vessels 1977 and any subsequent variations thereto which may be necessitated by the protocol to that convention which is currently under consideration by the International Maritime Organisation. Regulations made under the Safety at Sea Act 1986 to introduce safety training for entrants into the industry came into force during March this year.

West Yorkshire

Q40. Mr. Kirkhope: To ask the Prime Minister if she will visit West Yorkshire.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has no plans to do so.

Somerset

Q57. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Prime Minister if she will visit Somerset.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has no plans to do so.

A1/M1 (Delays)

Q71. Mr. Holt: To ask the Prime Minister what reports have been made to her of delays when travelling by ministerial car on the A1/M1 road during the last six months.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has not received any such representations. But my right hon. Friend is aware of the concern in the north-east about the upgrading of the A1. The White Paper "Roads for Prosperity" includes among the schemes set out, proposals to a value of £700 million to improve over half the length of the A1 between the M25 and Tyneside. When all schemes are completed, all the sections from the M18 to Tyneside will be motorway or near motorway throughout.

Black Country

Q76. Mrs. Hicks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will visit the black country.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has no plans to do so.

GATT

Q118. Mr. John Browne: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has received a number of representations relating to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade from foreign Government and United Kingdom interests.

OECD

Q119. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Prime Minister is she has received recent representations regarding the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

No. But the Government value the information and exchange of views which the OECD makes possible.

RAF

Q123. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Prime Minister is she has received recent representations regarding the Royal Air Force.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister regularly receives representations regarding the Royal Air Force.

Higher Education

Q127. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Prime Minister is she has received recent representations regarding higher education.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister receives many representations on education matters, including the Government's policies for higher education which are helping to take this autumn's student numbers above 1 million for the first time, and pave the way for yet greater participation in the years ahead.

Greenhouse Effect

Q142. Sir Hugh Rossi: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the greenhouse effect.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The House of Commons Select Committee on Energy has recently reported on the energy policy implications of the greenhouse effect. The Government are currently studying the report and will reply shortly.

Transport Museum, Low Moor

Q147. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Prime Minister when she next expects to pay an official visit to the site of the Transport museum at Low Moor, Bradford.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has no plans to do so.

Army

Q151. Mr. Mallins: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the Army.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister regularly receives representations regarding the Army.

Crime

Q161. Mr. Marland: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the level of crime.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has received a number of such representations. The continuing fall in the overall level of recorded crime shown in the statistics for the year ending 30 June 1989 is encouraging, though the figures are still too high.

Bank of England

Q162. Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the Bank of England.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

No.

Employment

Q167. Mr. William Powell: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the level of employment.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has received a number of representations about the level of employment. The work force in employment in the United Kingdom now stands at 26,357,000. That level is the highest ever recorded and is an increase of 2,793,000 since March 1983. It is 872,000 more than the previous peak in employment in December 1979.

Motor Industry

Q173. Mr. Page: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the motor industry.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The motor industry is one of Britain's major industries and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister often receives representations about it.

Nuclear Deterrent

Q174. Mr. Fishburn: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the nuclear deterrent.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has received a number of letters from individuals and organisations.

Merchant Fleet

Q206. Sir David Price: To ask the Prime Minister in view of the ninth report of the Select Committee on Defence entitled "The Availability of Merchant Shipping for Defence Purposes: July 1989", what steps she intends to take to reverse the decline in British merchant ships available for defence purposes.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have already introduced a number of measures to help the merchant shipping industry. The effects of the Government's measures depend to a large extent on the practical response of the industry, which the Government await with interest.

Government Advertising

Mr. Wray: To ask the Prime Minister whether she will take steps to ensure that all Government Departments and offices apply the same standards as used by local authorities when dealing with Government advertising.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

Advertising by Government Departments is already subject to conventions as stringent as those applied to local authority advertising. Consolidated guidance was issued by the Cabinet Office to Departments earlier this year, and a copy has been placed in the Library.

Conservative Party Conference

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list those civil servants and their Departments officially present at the Conservative party conference, including those from her private office.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

A private secretary and a typist were present at the Conservative party conference to assist the Prime Minister in her official duties. In addition, three members of the No. 10 Policy Unit (who are special advisers) were present. Information about attendances at the conference by officials in other Departments is not available centrally.

Second World War (History Teaching)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister what representations she has received on the teaching in secondary schools of the history of the last war; what response she has made; and if she will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have received no representations specifically on the teaching of the history of the last war. Some have been received about the proposals for the teaching of history made in the interim report of the national curriculum working group. The group is expected to make its final report to my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Education and Science and for Wales before Christmas.

Labour Party Policies (Costings)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister which Departments have been involved in asking civil servants to cost the Labour party's policies; which ones have actually undertaken this costing; and if she will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

Officials stand ready to estimate the cost of proposals for expenditure if asked to do so by their Ministers. A number of departmental Ministers have asked their officials to estimate the cost of specific proposals which are thought to be endorsed by the Labour party. The provision of factual material of this sort by civil servants is consistent with the practice of previous Governments, and with the Cabinet Office rules on propriety.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if she will issue guidance to departmental Ministers that four to six weeks is a reasonable time scale for correspondence to be answered and that, in the exceptional cases where it is not, an answer should be sent to the hon. Member originating the correspondence advising him of the circumstances which prevent a definitive reply being sent within this time scale;

(2) what she assesses as a reasonable time for a Department to respond to correspondence from an hon. Member.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

Ministers normally seek to provide answers within the timescale mentioned by my hon. Friend or to send interim replies when this is not possible.

Engagements

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 October.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 October.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 October.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday, 19 October.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday, 19 October.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is attending the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Kuala Lumpur.

Chequers

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister what was the charge to public funds of decoration and furnishings at Chequers during 1988-89 and the estimated costs in 1989-90

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The maintenance of Chequers is the responsibility of the Chequers Trust. The trust receives an annual grant-in-aid from public funds to meet the deficiency between its income and the total maintenance cost of Chequers. The amount of the grant-in-aid in 1989-90 is £238,000, the same as 1988-89.

EMPLOYMENT

Workplace Nurseries

195. Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has held with the Equal Opportunities Commission to discuss the provision of workplace nurseries.

196. Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has held with the Equal Opportunities Commission to discuss the provision of workplace nurseries.

197. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has held with the Equal Opportunities Commission to discuss the provision of workplace nurseries.

198. Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has held with the Equal Opportunities Commission to discuss the provision of workplace nurseries.

Mr. Nicholls: I have had discussions on childcare with the chair of the Equal Opportunities Commission at meetings of the Advisory Committee on Women's Employment, which I chair. Workplace nurseries are among the matters discussed.

Public Bodies

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a list of non-departmental public bodies appointed by him showing the salaries paid in each individual case; and what is the total public expenditure involved in running these organisations in a full year.

Mr. Nicholls: The table gives the information in respect of bodies sponsored by the Department. Appointment of members to the Employment Appeal Tribunal are made by Her Majesty The Queen and appointments of chairmen of industrial tribunals are made by the Lord Chancellor. Appointments to other bodies are made either directly by my right hon. friend or by the appropriate executive body. The total annual public expenditure involved in running these organisations was £3,622 million as at 1 April 1989.

Self-employment

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his assessment of the change in the numbers of self-employed in the next 12 months.

Mr. Nicholls: The Department does not make forward projections of the self-employed.

Between March 1981 and March 1989 self-employment was estimated to increase by 985,000, and now stands at 3,079,000.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is given in the table:

	Number of staff who have attended courses specifically on information technology	Percentage of staff in the grade	Number of staff who have attended courses with an element of information technology	Percentage of staff in the grade
Grade 1	1	50	1	50
Grade 2	4	100	1	25
Grade 3	11	41	13	48

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Eggar: Excluding stand-alone word processors, there are 19,420 work stations currently installed in the Employment Department group; a ratio of 1:2·8 civil servants.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Eggar: The day-to-day management of the Employment Department group's information technology (IT) strategy is the responsibility of officials. I am the Minister responsible for IT matters in the Employment Department group. IT is in general so integrated into the Department's business functions that to attempt to apportion specific intervals of a Minister's time to its consideration would involve a disproportionate effort.

Closed Shop

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the breakdown by industry and region of the 1·3 million workers now covered by the pre-entry closed shop.

Mr. Fowler: The Green Paper "Removing Barriers to Employment" (CM 655), published on 20 March 1989, referred to a survey carried out by NOP Market Research Ltd between 22 February and 6 March 1989 which indicated that the number of people covered by pre-entry closed shop arrangements was of the order of 1·3 million. The pre-entry closed shop was most extensive in manufacturing, energy and water supply, and transport and communication. Among manufacturing industries, publishing and printing was the sector with the highest incidence. Membership of both pre-entry and post-entry shops was above average in the central and northern regions of Britain and below average in the south.

A full analysis of the data obtained in the survey will be published in an article in the November issue of the Employment Gazette.

Construction Industry

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) deaths and (b) injuries occurred in the construction industry in each of the last five years; and how many such deaths and injuries occurred among workers employed by a firm in possession of a 714 certificate.

Mr. Nicholls: The available information is given in the table. It is not possible to identify those injuries occurring to workers employed by a firm in possession of a 714 certificate.

Health and Safety

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will now introduce legislation under section 79 of the Health and Safety at Work Etc. Act 1974, requiring directors' reports to contain information on health and safety policy.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Member to my answer in the Official Report on 24 July 1989 at column 484.

Factory and Agriculture Inspectors

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment why he has not yet replied to the letter of 27 June from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East concerning his undertaking of 2 December 1987 to increase the number of factory and agriculture inspectors by 40 by 31 March 1989.

Mr. Fowler: A reply was sent on 18 October 1989.

Employment Training

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many local authorities who originally participated in employment training have now withdrawn; how many who acted as training agents have been dropped; in each case what was the reason; and what was the political control of the council and the date in each instance.

Mr. Nicholls: Seven local authorities have withdrawn from employment training. No local authority acting as a training agent has been dropped from the programme. Details are given in the following table:

Local authorities who have withdrawn	Political control	Date withdrew	Reason
Barrow Borough Council	Labour	4 November 1988	Political opposition
Rochdale Metropolitan Borough Council	Labour	24 February 1989	Political opposition
Wolverhampton Metropolitan Borough Council	Labour	End August 1989	Political opposition
Nottinghamshire County Council	Labour	End December 1988	Political opposition
London Borough of Merton	Conservative	19 May 1989	Operational difficulties
London Borough of Barnet	Conservative	31 March 1989	Operational difficulties
Cleveland County Council	Labour	3 September 1989	Political opposition

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what consideration he has given to the report on employment training commissioned by the Training Agency which reviewed the position within the south Yorkshire area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: This particular survey was carried out in February and March. It was commissioned by one of the Training Agency's area offices to help them and their training agents and training managers address a number of teething problems encountered in the first six months of employment training in that area.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the methods used by his Department to assess (a) the quality of the training given through the employment training programme and (b) its results in terms of both skills learned by the trainees and their subsequent full-time employment.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 18 October 1989]: The main methods used to assess the quality of training in employment training are:

An examination of providers against specific criteria leading to the award of approved status; and ongoing and comprehensive annual review to measure progress and ensure that quality training programmes continue to be delivered.

In addition, from next April the remit of the independent Training Standards Advisory Service will be extended to cover the inspection of employment training providers.

The skills learned by trainees and their subsequent full-time employment will be assessed through information contained on leavers' certificates completed by training managers when a trainee leaves the programme and through a questionnaire sent to trainees three months after they have left employment training.

SCOTLAND

Schools Inspectors

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the visits and reports of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools in Govan constituency, over the past two years.

Mr. Lang: One nursery school, Rosehall nursery school (1987), two primary schools, Greenfield primary school (1988) and Drumoyne primary school (1989) and one secondary school, St. Gerard's secondary school (1988) have been fully inspected and reports published over the past two years.

In addition, visits have been paid to two other primary schools, Copeland Road primary school and Elderpark primary school and two other secondary schools, Bellahouston academy and Govan secondary school, for more limited purposes.

Public Bodies

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a list of non-departmental public bodies appointed by him; if he will list the names and employment of each member, showing salaries paid; and what is the total public expenditure involved in running these organisations in a full year.

Mr. Rifkind: The list of non-departmental public bodies to which I make appointments is contained in the Cabinet

Office publication "Public Bodies", a copy of which is available in the Library. The list includes information about the numbers of appointments, the remuneration paid to members, the cost of administration and the public expenditure for which the body is responsible.

One major public body has been set up since the publication of "Public Bodies 1988". This is Scottish Homes, to which I have appointed a chairman (remuneration £28,980 per annum) and eight members (£3,964 per annum).

A list (correct at 5 December 1988) of all the members of the Scottish bodies in "Public Bodies 1988" was placed in the Library in response to a question from the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) answered on 7 December 1988 at column 211.

Housing

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table by district council showing the number of district council Scottish Homes, housing association and private sector houses; and if he will show each category as a percentage of the total stock.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The available information, as recorded on the valuation roll at 31 March 1989, is shown in the table. A breakdown of the privately owned total into housing association and others is not available. Scottish Homes did not begin operating until 1 April 1989; the figures provided relate to the Scottish Special Housing Association (SSHA).

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish details of research projects in the field of housing fully or partly funded by his Department in each of the past 10 years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on social research in the housing field is contained in the "Register of Research" which is published each year by the central research unit of the Scottish Development Department and placed in the House of Commons Library. The Scottish Development Department also funds building research in the housing field, and I shall write to the hon. Member with such information as is available about this research.

Water Authorities

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the capital allocation to Scottish water authorities in each of the past 10 years at constant prices.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Capital allocations for water are not made separately. They are included in the allocations to authorities in Scotland for their water and sewerage programmes. Allocations, all at 1989 prices, are given in the table. At cash prices, the allocation for 1989-90 is 14 per cent. greater than the initial allocation for the previous year.

Capital allocation for water and sewerage programmes

1987-88	116·8
1988-89	[1]115·6
1989-90	121·5

[1] Excludes a supplementary allocation of £5·9 million made late in the year.

Child Care

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the CBI on employer-contribution to meeting the needs of single parents for child care facilities during the parental work-day.

Mr. Lang: None. With the Government's encouragement, more employers are now considering measures, including provision of child care facilities, to recruit and retain staff with family responsibilities.

Security

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the amount spent from within district council housing budgets on security provisions in the year 1988-89 or the latest year for which data are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

Homelessness

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of homeless people in Scotland as a whole, and for each of the four city district councils.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Development Department does not make estimates of the numbers of homeless people.

Details of the numbers of households who have applied to local authorities under the homelessness provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 are shown in table 21 of the Scottish Development Department's statistical bulletin HSU No. 7 published in July 1989, copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the numbers registered as homeless in (a) Dundee and (b) Scotland in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The numbers of applicant households assessed as homeless by local authorities under the homelessness legislation are set out in the table:

	Dundee	Scotland
1978-79	210	7,490
1979-80	199	7,443
1980-81	155	7,024
1981-82	165	8,268
1982-83	171	8,665
1983-84	185	8,094
1984-85	399	9,912
1985-86	602	11,022
1986-87	565	10,557
1987-88	363	9,419

Greater Glasgow Health Board

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the full year expenditure on public relations by Greater Glasgow health board.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally and is not separately identified in the annual accounts.

Housing Legislation

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what statutory measures the Government have taken to amend housing legislation where reference to rateable value of a dwelling house helped define tenancy, in the light of the abolition of domestic rates.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Schedule 10 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 defined tenancies for which a landlord had a statutory basic repairing obligation by means of rateable value. The Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 amended that provision to empower the Secretary of State instead to set a rent level up to which the statutory repairing obligation would apply. The Landlord's Repairing Obligations (Specified Rent) (Scotland) (No. 2) Order 1988, (SI 1988 No. 2155) which came into force on 2 January 1989, set that rent level at £300 per week. This means that the landlord will have these repairing obligations if the rent is less than that figure.

Rateable value is also used to define certain tenancies which are not protected under the Rent (Scotland) Act 1984. However, the rateable value in these cases is historic —the value appearing on the valuation roll on 23 March 1965 (except where the house appeared on the roll for the first time later). Accordingly there is no need to amend those provisions.

Flat-roofed Housing

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what studies have been undertaken by his Department of possible links between flat-roofed housing and dampness.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My Department has not undertaken any studies of possible links between flat-roofed housing and dampness. The Building Research Establishment, however, has a continuing programme of research to monitor the performance of flat roofing products and the design of flat roofs.

Damp

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when his Department last conducted a study or survey of dampness in local authority housing.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is for local authorities themselves to assess the state of their own housing stocks. Nevertheless, the Scottish Development Department carried out a survey of dampness in housing in 1980 and published the results in 1981 in the "Condensation Study Report". The Department also added a Scottish trailer to the EC labour force survey in 1983 which included questions on condensation, dampness and mould growth. An analysis of the results of this survey was carried out in 1984 and published as "Condensation in Housing".

Lithotriptor Centre

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when SHHD made its decision to instruct the Scottish lithotriptor centre to charge health boards for services; and when the official notice of this change in policy was sent to clinicians.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Following a meeting with general managers on 22 February, the Scottish Home and Health Department wrote to all health boards on 13 March formally advising them that resources available for lithotripsy would be distributed to all boards in 1989-90. Detailed arrangements for the invoicing of referrals were contained in a further letter dated 29 June. Informing clinicians of these arrangements was a matter for health boards.

Law Commission

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which matters are currently under examination by the Scottish Law Commission.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Commission's annual reports detail the matters under examination. The report for the year to 15 June 1989 is to be published shortly. A copy will be available in the Library.

Bracken

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is his Department's policy towards alerting members of the public about the possible dangers of contact with bracken; and what specific notices have been put up in Scotland;

(2) whether his Department intends to take any steps to reduce the risk and incidence of cancer from carcinogenic substances in bracken.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There is no evidence at present to suggest that any cancers in humans are attributable to carcinogen sources in bracken. Scientific research in this field is closely monitored and appropriate action to warn the public would be taken if any statistical evidence of a link between bracken spores and cancer in humans was established.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Rifkind: Fourteen officials at grade 3 and above have attended a course specifically on information technology representing 42 per cent. of staff in those grades; seven have attended courses containing an element of information technology, representing 21 per cent.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Rifkind: At present there are 1,334 computer work stations installed in the Scottish Office, excluding the minor departments and the Scottish prison service. This represents one work station for every 4·5 members of staff. This figure includes linked terminals and both linked and stand-alone microcomputers but excludes all stand-alone word processors.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day managment of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Rifkind: Ministerial responsibility for matters arising from the day-to-day management of the Scottish Office's information technology strategy lies with me. No matters requiring my attention arose in the month up to Friday 13 October.

A90 (Signs)

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of the three metal and concrete signs recently erected on the A90 between Inverkeithing and the Forth road bridge; and what is their purpose.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The tender price for the three A90 Gantry structures was £144,856, and that for providing and installing the equipment within the gantries was £260,427.

The purpose of the gantries when fitted with signalling equipment will be to control, divert or stop traffic approaching the bridge when the bridge is closed for any reason, lane closures are in operation (for accidents, maintenance or breakdowns) or special vehicles are being escorted across the bridge. This is part of a complete signalling system expected to be operational early in the new year.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report (a) the number of people living within Highland region who are over the age of 18 years and who are registered as mentally handicapped on the joint health and social work register and (b) the number of people living within Highland region who have been exempted from community charge liability on the ground of mental handicap.

Mr. Lang: The number of people aged over 18 years in Highland region who are listed in the joint health board and social work register as mentally handicapped total 640, of whom 140 are known to be accommodated in hospital at present.

On the basis of information supplied by the community charges registration officer for Highland region, 280 people were exempt from the personal community charge in Highland on the ground of severe mental impairment as at the beginning of September.

Housing (Strathclyde)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in the light of the evidence submitted by district councils and the Strathclyde regional liaison committee on the question of housing land targets in the Strathclyde structure plan 1986 update, he will make it his policy to ensure that his proposed modifications to the 1988 update will not have a significant effect on the green belt.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to announce his decision on the 1988 update shortly, and I cannot anticipate his conclusions on this issue.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the staffing consequences in planning authorities of the proposed quarterly roll-on of private sector housing demand contained in his draft decision letter on the Strathclyde structure plan 1988 update.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A number of planning authorities have commented on this issue in responding to my right hon. and learned Friend's draft modifications, and he will take these comments into account in reaching his decision.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what research he has conducted into builders' assessment of their need for residential building land in Strathclyde; and if he will publish the result.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has commissioned a number of pieces of research on the subject of housing land in Scotland in recent years, all of which have been or will be published, but none of them relates specifically to Strathclyde.

Water Supply

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report all those areas in the Borders region where the existing public supply of water does not conform to European Community standards, indicating in each case the cause of the breach of the EC regulation.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Public water supplies in Borders region comply with the terms of the EC drinking water directive, with the exception of five supplies which are the subject of applications for delays in terms of article 20. These are listed with the parameters where the standards are not met.

Borders region—Areas where water fails to meet EC parameter standards

Area	Supply	Parameter
Carlops	Carlops	Microbiological[1]
Parts of central Borders	Wantonwalls	Aluminium
Ettrickbridge	Ettrickbridge	Iron

Area	Supply	Parameter
Parts of East Berwickshire	Rawburn	Iron
Parts of central Borders	Roberton	Aluminium

[1] Will comply this year.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to increase capital resources in Scotland to ensure that the quality of water in areas including the Borders conforms to European Community standards; and how long he estimates it will take to achieve these standards throughout the Borders region.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Resources have been increased already. The 1989-90 capital provision for water and sewerage services is £126 million, a 14 per cent. increase over the previous year's planned provision. Regional and islands councils have been asked to provide details of costed action programmes to achieve full compliance with the EC drinking water directive. These will be taken into account when setting next year's allocations.

In Borders region most supplies already meet EC standards. Only one small treatment works will not produce water complying within the next year and in two other supply areas improvements to iron mains will be phased over a few years. Planned expenditure for the next three years is concentrated on further improvement of water treatment works and distribution mains to ensure that the standards continue to be met in the future.

Health Councils

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now publish his detailed conclusions on the recent review of the management of health councils in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am at present giving active consideration to the arrangements which are likely to ensure the most effective consumer representation in the National Health Service, and I hope to make an announcement soon.

Primary Roads

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library copies of all the technical working papers commissioned and received in preparation for the recently published consultation document on primary road routes south of Edinburgh.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is not our practice to place copies of detailed technical reports on road studies in the Library. I have lodged copies of the consultation document in the Library, however, and I will arrange to append to them a series of short technical papers which provide further details on specific aspects of the study.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the terms of reference used to instruct those preparing the recently published consultation document on primary road routes south of Edinburgh, listing any outside independent experts or professionals involved in the exercise.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The brief for the study which led to the consultation document was:

"To assess the effectiveness of the existing trunk road network in meeting the national and local objectives as regards current and future traffic demands between Edinburgh and its environs and the South, including in particular the motorway and trunk road network in England and Wales, and as regards strategic road links to and from the Borders Region.

To evaluate the alternative route options including, as necessary, roads which are not at present trunk roads.

To recommend a future route strategy".

Consulting civil engineers Scott Wilson Kirkpatrick and Partners were appointed to undertake the study and the market research team of the MVA Consultancy were employed to carry out a series of interviews with road users.

Education Working Parties

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons from the independent sector were invited by the SCC and SEB to be part of the working parties and short-life working groups for standard grade and revised higher.

Mr. Lang: Three.

Examinations

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to allow choice of examinations in the state sector by ending the monopoly of the SEB.

Mr. Lang: Presenting centres are free to enter candidates for examinations of their choice, subject to the policy of their education authority.

Housing Revenue Accounts

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the percentages of housing revenue accounts constituted by rate and revenue fund contributions and the actual levels of revenue fund contributions in (a) Dundee district council and (b) all Scottish district councils in each of the past 10 years for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The amounts of rate fund contributions made to local authority housing revenue accounts by Dundee district council and by district councils in Scotland as a whole are shown in the table, together with the expression of these amounts as a percentage of total housing revenue account income:

	Dundee		Scotland
	Contributions £ million	Percentage of income Per cent.	Contributions £ million	Percentage of income Per cent.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the levels of outstanding debt on the housing revenue accounts of (a) Dundee district council and (b) all Scottish district councils in each of the past 10 years for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The amounts of outstanding capital debt relating to local authority housing revenue accounts at 31 March of each year are shown in the table:

TVEI

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what provision has been envisaged for pupils studying standard grade subjects in which the minimum time of four times 40 minutes per week for two years cannot be found because of time required to complete the residential and work experience elements of TVEI.

Mr. Lang: The guidelines on curriculum design in secondary education issued by the SCCC with the approval of my right hon. and learned Friend in July take full account of the requirements of TVEI, and no such problem as the hon. Member envisages should arise.

Young Homeless

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what record he maintains of those under 18 who are homeless; and if he will publish in the Official Report the statistics showing the level of homeless among (a) 16-year-olds and (b) 17-year-olds in (i) Dundee and (ii) Scotland in each of the past 10 years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available. Information is collected centrally, based on returns from local authorities, on households which apply to local authorities under the homelessness legislation, but the age of applicants is not included.

School Curriculum

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of the activities of the Scottish Central Council on the curriculum in each year since 1985.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is as follows:

Year	£000
1985-86	831
1986-87	961
1987-88	963
1988-89	1,068

Council Rents

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the average council rents in (a) Dundee and (b) Scotland in each of the past 10 years for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is set out in the table:

Housing

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the numbers of houses completed in (a) Dundee and (b) Scotland by (i) district councils, (ii) housing associations, (iii) the private sector and (iv) the housing co-operatives in each of the past 10 years for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The available information is set out in the table.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by district the proportion of land in Scotland designated as sites of special scientific interest or otherwise protected.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 20 July 1989]: The following table lists by district the proportion of land in Scotland designated as sites of special scientific interest. This information has been provided by the Nature Conservancy Council.

DEFENCE

Soviet Air Force

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any evidence that the Soviet Air Force has reduced its nuclear capability.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We have no evidence that the Soviet Air Force has reduced its nuclear capability. Although the Soviets have indicated that they will withdraw some nuclear bombs from the forward area, it must be remembered that these weapons could be redeployed at short notice and overall numbers would not be reduced.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to receive the result of the consultancy study commissioned into the recruitment of ethnic minorities, into the armed services following the recommendations of the Marilyn report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The report on the study into ethnic minority recruitment to the armed services was received in July. The report is being considered within the Ministry of Defence and an announcement will be made shortly.

Trident

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the management of, and current progress with, the design and production of the warheads for the Trident missile system, undertaken at the atomic weapons establishments at Llanishen, Aldermaston and Burghfield.

Mr. Alan Clark: Work undertaken at the various sites of the atomic weapons establishment is progressing satisfactorily towards the Trident in-service date of the mid-1990s. Design of the warhead is now complete and production of both fissile and non-fissile components has begun.

AWRE Workers (Retraining)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what schemes are available for retraining plutonium warhead fabrication and design workers at atomic weapons research establishments, Aldermaston and Burghfield, to work on civil projects.

Mr. Alan Clark: None.

Nuclear Test Ban (Verification)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on current progress in research undertaken in the United Kingdom to support the verification requirements of a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty; how much is allocated annually by Her Majesty's Government to such verification research; and what collaboration on such verification is undertaken with other countries.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The MOD's research establishment at Blacknest near Aldermaston undertakes seismological research which could be used in establishing the requirements of a verification regime for further constraints on nuclear testing. The cost of this work for the financial year 1988-89 was some £1·5 million.

Scientists from Blacknest have international standing and co-operate with representatives of a number of countries on a bilateral basis. They also provide the United Kingdom's representatives to the conference on disarmament's ad hoc group of scientific experts to consider international co-operative measures to detect and identify seismic events.

Warstocks

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence during what periods in the past year the Royal Navy's warstocks did not meet national and NATO requirements.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Detailed information on the level of warstocks is classified, but in the past year naval stock levels have met NATO and national requirements in all but a few areas.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence during what periods in the past year the RAF warstocks did not meet national and NATO requirements.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Detailed information on the level of warstocks is classified but in the past year RAF stock levels have met NATO and national requirements in all but a few areas.

Defence Export Services Organisation

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many persons are employed by the Defence Export Services Organisation; and what is its total budget.

Mr. Alan Clark: Some 200 staff are employed within the Defence Export Services Organisation in support of defence exports and in the administration of export control regimes. Export promotion costs such as exhibition expenditure and the loan of personnel and equipment are self-financing, and the net cost to defence votes of the support to defence exports is of the order of £6 million. A further 50 staff within DESO are engaged in the disposal of surplus MOD equipment and stores which it is estimated will generate net receipts of some £23 million in the current financial year.

Holy Loch Base

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many visits to the Holy Loch base have been made by United States vessels carrying SLCMs.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United States Navy does not confirm or deny the presence of submarine-launched cruise missiles on board particular vessels.

New Works

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much will be spent in (a) Scotland and (b) the south-east of England in 1989-90 for new works gross total as indicated in table 2·4 of Cm. 675-II.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence does not routinely account for expenditure on a regional basis and such a breakdown could not be produced without incurring disproportionate cost.

Equipment Exports (Africa)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all African countries to which export of defence equipment took place in 1987.

Mr. Alan Clark: It has been the practice of successive Administrations not to publish such detailed lists but statistics of United Kingdom defence sales from 1983-88 by broad geographic regions are set out in volume 2 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1989".

Service Personnel (Loan Service)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the countries to which service personnel were on loan service in 1987-88, showing numbers and ranks of personnel.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: During 1987 and 1988 British service personnel served on loan to the following countries:

Australia
Bahrain
Bangladesh
Barbados
Belize
Bermuda
Brunei
Dominica
Fiji
Gambia
Ghana
Hong Kong
Indonesia
Jordan
Kenya

Kuwait
Lesotho
Malaysia
Mauritius
New Zealand
Nigeria
Oman
Qatar
Saudi Arabia
St. Lucia
St. Vincent
Singapore
Sudan
Swaziland
Uganda
United Arab Emirates
Zimbabwe[1]

[1] Since January 1986 a wing of the British military advisory and training team has been specifically allocated to train Mozambican troops in Zimbabwe.

Information on the numbers and ranks of loan service personnel is confidential between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of the countries concerned.

West Germany (Co-operation)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in what areas other than training and logistics the United Kingdom is currently engaged in bilateral co-operation with the armed forces of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We co-operate closely with the Federal Republic of Germany on a broad range of defence matters of mutual interest as a contribution to our joint commitment to the NATO Alliance. In addition to training and logistics, these include defence policy questions, operational planning, defence procurement matters, and concepts. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his German counterpart have recently agreed on a number of measures to extend Anglo-German bilateral co-operation within the Alliance and are considering the establishment of a joint air defence unit in Germany.

Nuclear Artillery

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the extent of deployment at the latest available date of nuclear artillery by North Atlantic Treaty Organisation forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Information on the deployment of nuclear-certified artillery by North Atlantic Treaty Organisation forces is provided in chapter 6 and figure 12 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1989" (Cm. 675-I).

Brunei

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the purpose of maintaining a garrison in Brunei.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The presence of the Gurkha battalion in Brunei, which is by the mutual agreement of the two Governments, contributes to the stability of Brunei and the surrounding area. In addition, the battalion, which is normally found in rotation from the Hong Kong garrison, has in Brunei opportunities for training which are not available in Hong Kong.

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has to locate sea-launched cruise missiles at bases in Scotland.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It has been the policy of successive Governments neither to confirm nor deny the presence of nuclear weapons at particular locations.

Major Equipment Orders

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the expenditure for each of the three services separately on major equipment orders as set out in table 5, page 30 of Cm. 675-I; and what was the share taken up in Scotland as a proportion of each service expenditure and of the total for all three.

Mr. Alan Clark: The comprehensive and consistent information required in answer to the first part of the hon. Member's question could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

I refer the hon. Member to the answers given to the hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) on 5 December 1988 at column 73 in answer to the second part of his question.

Royal Navy (External Contractors)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the Royal Navy's expenditure in the latest available year on using external contractors' aircraft, aircrew and maintenance personnel in target simulation and electronic warfare training; and what proportion was taken up by companies registered in Scotland.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Because these tasks are undertaken by a single contractor, the information requested is commercial in confidence between the Ministry of Defence and the contractor concerned and cannot be divulged to a third party. No Scottish-registered companies received any portion of this work.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which members of the Warsaw pact other than the Soviet Union produce chemical weapons.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All non-Soviet Warsaw pact countries have civil chemical industries capable of producing chemical warfare agents and their pre-cursors. We have good reason to believe that several non-Soviet Warsaw pact countries have undertaken offensive chemical warfare research and development programmes and that in some cases these have been taken forward to the production stage.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which NATO countries have chemical warfare stocks.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United States possesses a limited retaliatory stockpile of chemical weapons.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology; and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Alan Clark: Twenty-four civilian officers in grades 1, 2 and 3 have attended courses specifically on information technology since promotion to the level of grade 3. Twenty-eight officers (including 12 of those who have attended specific courses) have attended courses containing an element of information technology. These represent 35 per cent. and 41 per cent. respectively of the total number of staff in these grades.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many work stations excluding stand-alone word processors are currently installed in his Department; and what is the ratio of such work stations to civil servants.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Alan Clark: The day-to-day management of the Department's information technology (IT) strategy is the responsibility of officials. I am the Minister responsible for oversight of information technology matters. Information technology is in general so integrated into the Department's business functions that to attempt to apportion specific intervals of an individual's time to its consideration would involve too high a proportion of variables.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he proposes to have members of the Ulster Defence Regiment re-vetted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Further improvements are being made to the processes of screening new recruits to the Ulster Defence Regiment, transferees from other Army units, and for carrying out reviews as appropriate. Among the new measures is the establishment of an enhanced and specifically-dedicated screening unit.

Project Cancellations

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Official Report those weapons and systems projects in the last five years for each of the three services which have been cancelled or otherwise aborted prior to being brought into service, showing the amount of development money lost prior to cancellation and as a proportion of the total budgeted cost of the original project.

Mr. Alan Clark: Major weapons systems projects which had entered full development and which were subsequently cancelled, in the last five financial years, prior to being brought into service are as follows:

(a) Project	(b) Service	(c) Expenditure at Cancellation (£ million)	(d) (c) as a percentage of estimated Project Total
CACS 4	RN	[1]39	14
SP70	Army	88	35
Nimrod AEW	RAF	660	50

[1] Part of the development cost of CACS 4, amounting to £11 million, was previously commercially sensitive.

TRANSPORT

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will publish in the Official Report the road routes chosen to convey nuclear waste between Torness and Sellafield which pass through the Borders regional council area;

(2) what extra steps have been taken to ensure that nuclear waste being transported by road through the Borders region will not endanger public safety during transit.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The choice of route is a matter for the carrier. All radioactive materials must be carried in compliance with national and international regulations which require proper safety levels for both normal and accident conditions to be built into the container used for transport.

King's Cross Study

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the terms of reference given to the consultants drawing up proposals for the King's Cross gyratory road system; when he expects this study to be completed; and if he intends to publish it in full as soon as it is finished.

Mr. Atkins: Possible improvements to roads in the King's Cross area are being considered as part of the east London assessment study. The terms of reference were published in July 1987.

The study consultants have also been asked to advise on improvements of the King's Cross junctions that would be needed to cope with the extra traffic which would be generated by the proposed King's Cross railway land development. The results of this work will form the Department's comments to the London borough of Camden on the planning application.

Channel Tunnel Link

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has given the necessary expenditure approval to enable British Rail to deposit a Private Bill to construct the Channel tunnel rail link.

Mr. Portillo: Under section 17(1) of the Transport Act 1962, British Rail requires the formal consent of the Secretary of State to promote a Private Bill, but it does not require formal investment authority at that stage, and the deposit of a Bill by British Rail does not imply Government endorsement of any particular level of expenditure. The Secretary of State's consent for the Bill in question has not yet been sought.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied that British Rail's proposed Channel tunnel rail link will achieve an 8 per cent. rate of return.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail's proposals to provide facilities to deal with international rail traffic when the tunnel opens in 1993 include financial estimates which meet the Government's 8 per cent. required rate of return.

British Rail is currently discussing proposals with the private sector to build a new line to meet the anticipated growth in international traffic after the opening of the tunnel with a view to securing private investment in the scheme. If this were a public sector investment it would still be required to meet the Government's 8 per cent. return.

Airports (Traffic Distribution)

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he is yet in a position to respond to the Civil Aviation Authority's advice in CAP 559 on traffic distribution policy for airports serving the London area.

Mr. Parkinson: I have today written to Mr. Christopher Tugendhat, chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority, responding to the authority's advice in CAP 559. Copies of my letter have been placed in the Library.

I think it important to place this in the context of the strong growth in traffic at the regional airports. Developments like the new domestic module and terminal 2 at Manchester airport, Birmingham's new terminal, and an ongoing programme of improvements at other regional airports, are all evidence of the readiness and ability of the airports outside the south-east to take action to meet the growing demand. Expenditure at regional airports over the past decade has exceeded £300 million, and in the years immediately ahead can confidently be expected to increase by at least this much again.

At the same time, there is much activity in the south-east. The new terminal at Stansted and the redevelopment of Heathrow's terminal 3 are notable, but small airports are also investing: Manston for example, and, on the business aviation front, significant advances are being made at Farnborough and Biggin Hill.

It is equally important to view CAP 559 in the light of the wider-ranging work on which the authority will be reporting to me next summer. This includes examining the role of airports outside the south-east, the possible need for and location of a new south-east runway, and the potential for introducing a more market-oriented means of dealing with the capacity problems at Heathrow and Gatwick.

Against this background, I have accepted the authority's principal recommendation that no new traffic distribution rules should be made for the London area airports. I have also accepted the authority's recommendation that I should formally set aside the two "deferred rules"—concerning priority at Gatwick for scheduled traffic, and limits on service frequencies at Heathrow—which the then Secretary of State said in 1986 he would be prepared to make when advised of the need.

I have decided not to make the two modifications to the present rules which the authority suggested. While I recognise that permitting series charter flights at Heathrow on a limited basis could be regarded as an easing of regulation, it would not significantly affect the overall balance of supply and demand for runway capacity in the London area. I wish to consider this suggestion further when I have seen the outcome of the CAA's wider-ranging work next year.

I am of course anxious to encourage the important business aviation sector, and I recognise the difficulties it has in the London area. But the second proposed modification, that business and corporate aviation should take precedence over other general aviation, would introduce a new restriction on a new class of traffic. Because other general aviation movements are very few at Heathrow and Gatwick, it would in practice provide no real benefit. In these circumstances I do not consider the case for change sufficiently compelling to justify the introduction of further regulation.

The authority suggested a modest relaxation in the noise restrictions at Heathrow and Gatwick. Noise is always a sensitive issue. I believe that the Government struck a reasonable balance in the night noise regime which was introduced last year, and which was to run until 1992-93.

I remain committed to improving the night noise climate around Heathrow and Gatwick, and to reducing aircraft noise generally, whilst recognising that undue burdens must not be imposed on the aviation industry.

Whilst I have considered the authority's argument for a relaxation in the night restrictions, I recognise that respondents were divided in their views. I take the view that the present night noise arrangements should remain unchanged.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make an interim statement of the discussions taking place between the local authority associations and his Department on the impact which an increase in the maximum permitted weight of heavy goods vehicles to 40 tonnes will have on highway and bridge structures and in particular the funding of any enhancement to take account of heavier vehicles.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Irrespective of the increase in weight limits to apply from 1 January 1999, a substantial amount of work is needed to ensure that road bridges can continue to carry modern heavy lorries. My Department is having discussions with representatives of the local authority associations and other bodies on various aspects of this work, including the effects of the weight increase and funding arrangements.

From the start of the current year we increased the local authority highway maintenance baseline by £27 million, specifically to enable local authorities to start their programmes of assessment and strengthening of older bridges. We are considering the local authority associations' request to reclassify this expenditure as capital and to make it eligible for transport supplementary grant.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Occupational Pension Schemes

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what information is available as to the effect of section 15(1)(a) of the Social Security Act 1986 on the number of employees becoming or remaining members of occupational pension schemes in the public and private sectors, respectively.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Some independent bodies have published the results of their own sample of surveys into the effect of the 1986 Social Security Act changes on membership of occupational pension schemes. The information obtained has related to companies in the public and private sectors.

Funerals

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what records are kept by his Department of the average costs of the component parts of funeral arrangements.

Mr. Scott: None.

ENVIRONMENT

Waste Management

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what policy initiatives have been taken since August by the European Commission towards the tackling of hazardous, toxic and domestic waste handling and disposal in the European Community.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The European Commission published a proposed Community strategy for waste management on 18 September and this was deposited in Parliament on 17 October.

Water Privatisation

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how payment is to be made to water undertakers for water taken from a public hydrant or from domestic premises for fire fighting purposes.

Mr. Howard: Section 81 of the Water Act 1989 prohibits water undertakers from charging for water taken for fire fighting purposes. The cost of such water is recovered by water undertakers through charges to customers generally.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to introduce legislation covering the requirements to disclose information on difficult, hazardous, special and controlled toxic wastes by private waste treatment companies, which includes the same criteria for disclosure as are included in the United States Superfund Amendments and Re-authorization Act legislation.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government accept the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution that there should be a presumption in favour of unrestricted access for the public to information which the pollution control authorities obtain or receive by virtue of their statutory powers, with provision for secrecy only in those circumstances where a genuine case for it can be substantiated. It is already a duty of waste disposal to maintain a public register of waste disposal licences issued by them. We propose to extend the scope of these registers to include information on the monitoring of the facility by the authority, including details of enforcement notices served and prosecutions taken. We are consulting on public access to information on the processes to be scheduled under integrated pollution control. The disclosure criteria incorporated in the United States SARA legislation are tailored to the pollution control regime in that country and not all are applicable here.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many sites of special scientific interest were damaged or destroyed in the last 12 months; and what is his estimate of the number damaged or destroyed in the last five years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 22 June 1989 at column 199.

The information requested in respect of 1988-89 will be set out in the NCC's 15th annual report to be published on 22 November.

Toxic Waste, Wath upon Dearne

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the date on which a shipment containing toxic waste arrived at Wath upon Dearne near Rotherham; and when the South Yorkshire hazardous waste unit, the Health and Safety Executive and Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution became aware of the problem.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Shipments of contaminated material were delivered to Wath Recycling Ltd. at Wath upon Dearne during the week commencing 12 June. Authorities became aware of the problem on 19 June (South Yorkshire joint hazardous waste unit), 24 July (Health and Safety Executive) and 29 June (Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution).

Bathing Waters

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to bring bathing waters up to European standards.

Mr. Howard: On 4 October the Government sent to the Commission of the European Communities details of investment programmes designed to facilitate compliance by the United Kingdom with its obligations under the bathing water directive. Overall, around £1·1 billion will be spent improving bathing waters over the next 10 years.

Summary details of the investment programme are given in the following table. A list of individual schemes has been placed in the Library. Many of the schemes are at an early stage of development and are therefore subject to modification in the light of further assessment. For the same reason the estimated costs and completion dates are subject to change. Nevertheless by the mid-1990s we expect around 95 per cent. of our bathing waters to meet the directives standards and the full compliance programmes should be completed within 10 years.

Investment Programme to Achieve Compliance with Bathing Water Directive

	£ million
Northumbrian Water plc	86·2
Yorkshire Water plc	28·9
Anglian Water plc	150·1
Southern Water plc	216·7
Wessex Water plc	23·6
South West Water plc	312·5
Welsh Water plc	96·8
North West Water plc	147·2
Scotland	45·7
Northern Ireland	7·0
United Kingdom	1,114·7

Shore Width Reductions

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) of 8 May Official Report, column 349, if the report on research commissioned by his Department on reductions in shore width is yet available; and if he will place copies in the Library.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Copies of the report, which was published in August, have been placed in the Library.

Dangerous Dogs

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will consider introducing legislation concerning the ownership of rottweiler and similar breeds of dogs in the light of recent deaths; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Measures have been taken in the Dangerous Dogs Act 1989 to strengthen existing legislation on the control of dangerous dogs. We issued a consultation paper on 10 August which outlined further measures we propose on dog control. We are at present considering the responses to this consultation paper.

PCB Wastes

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the microbial destruction method for polychlorinated biphenyls developed by the Canadian National Institute of Scientific Research, at Pointe Claire, Montreal in Canada; and what are the implications of this development for future import of Canadian origin PCB wastes for incineration in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 19 October 1989]: This process is one of several under development for the biological treatment of dilute halogenated organics including PCBs. It is not an alternative to high temperature incineration of concentrated PCBs.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Conway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will issue the further paper giving details of the scheme of transitional relief for individual community charge payers.

Mr. Chope: My Department has today written to all local authorities with papers giving further information about the basis on which we propose transitional relief should be given. Copies of the letter and papers have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much capital expenditure is allocated for city technology colleges in (a) 1989-90, (b) 1990-91 and (c) 1991-92.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government plan to make the following investment in the CTC programme:

	£ million
1989-90	34·965
1990-91	35·055
1991-92	36·618

The balance of expenditure between capital and recurrent costs will depend on a number of factors, including the nature and condition of premises acquired and the speed with which sponsors' plans are implemented.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much of the capital expenditure for each of (i) Solihull city technology college, (ii) Nottingham city technology college and (iii) Middlesbrough city technology college came from (a) private sources and (b) public funds.

Mrs. Rumbold: Total capital grant from public funds and private funding for the three colleges which are now open are as follows, in £m:

	Total	Public funding	Private sources
Solihull	4·986	3·986	1·000
Nottingham	8·105	7·414	0·691
Middlesbrough	6·2555	4·8723	1·383

Considerable further capital expenditure is planned at Solihull and at Nottingham, and the total contribution from private sources will amount to at least 20 per cent. in the former and at least 17 per cent. in the latter.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how much of the capital expenditure is coming from (a) private sources and (b) public funds in respect of (i) Bradford, (ii) Dartford, (iii) Gateshead, (iv) Croydon, Sylvan and (v) Croydon city technology colleges;

(2) what proportion of the capital expenditure will come from (a) private sources and (b) public funds in respect of (i) Lewisham, (ii) Southwark and (iii) Brighton city technology colleges.

Mrs. Rumbold: In the case of the CTCs at Bradford, Dartford, Gateshead, Sylvan, Croydon, Southwark and Brighton the funding regime for capital expenditure will be 80 per cent. public and 20 per cent. private. In the case of the Croydon city college for the technology of the arts the regime will be 60 per cent. public and 40 per cent. private. For Lewisham, we have made clear that, subject to further feasibility work, the public sector investment will be at least £4 million. We expect that the contribution from the private sector for acquiring the site and establishing a CTC will amount to about 50 per cent. of initial capital expenditure.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much of the funds so far allocated towards the capital expenditure on city technology colleges has come from (a) private sources and (b) public funds.

Mrs. Rumbold: Actual capital expenditure on CTCs to date is as follows:

	Total £ million	Public funds £ million	Private sources £ million
Solihull CTC	4·986	3·986	1·000
Nottingham CTC	8·105	7·414	0·691
Teesside CTC	6·2555	4·8725	1·383
Tyneside CTC	0·880	0·880	0·000
Bradford CTC	1·8495	1·4795	0·370
Croydon City College for the Technology of the Arts	0·195	0·195	0·000
Dartford CTC	2·907	2·907	0·000
Brighton CTC	2·500	2·500	0·000
Croydon, Sylvan CTC	0·400	0·400	0·000
Bacon's CTC	0·000	0·000	0·000
Haberdashers' Aske's CTC	0·000	0·000	0·000

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the estimated annual revenue cost in each of the next three years of (a) Solihull, (b) Nottingham, (c) Middlesbrough, (d) Bradford, (e) Dartford, (f) Gateshead, (g) Croydon, Sylvan and (h) Croydon City technology colleges.

Mrs. Rumbold: The estimated costs of the Solihull, Nottingham and Middlesbrough CTCs for the academic year 1989-90 are:

Solihull	1,036,000
Nottingham	1,116,000
Middlesbrough	1,024,000

Figures for the other colleges, and for the three colleges in subsequent years, are not yet finally determined.

These recurrent costs include: a per capita grant, based upon spending in a comparable local education authority school; a temporary allowance for the diseconomies of operating schools which are not yet at their full capacity; and earmarked grant, for spending on specific purposes, namely: initial purchases of consumables, school meal subsidies, teacher training, information technology, and pupil support. With the exception of the information technology grant, all of them are calculated by reference to LEA norms.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Building

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish updated plans for the next phase of prison buildings.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In addition to the eight new prisons already opened 11 are being built and work has begun or will soon begin at Doncaster, Everthorpe and Ashford. Further plans cannot be announced until the final outcome of several outstanding applications for planning permission is known.

Crime Prevention

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue a code of practice covering the use of video cameras for surveillance purposes to combat crimes and installed in public places by either police authorities, local authorities or private security firms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Home Office issued guidelines in 1984 for the police on the use of surveillance equipment. These guidelines make it clear that CCTV devices should be used by the police only where they are necessary for the efficient conduct of police operations and with due regard for the intrusion of privacy that may result in particular circumstances.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rubber and Plastic Bullets

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total amount of compensation paid for (a) deaths and (b) injuries inflicted by (i) rubber bullets and (ii) plastic bullets in Northern Ireland 1969 to the present.

Mr. Cope: Between 1982 and 1989 (to 13 October) the total amount of damages paid as a result of claims made under the Police Act (Northern Ireland) 1970 against the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary for deaths and injuries resulting from the use of baton rounds is as follows:

Death	66,000·00
Injury	562,156·53

Information relating to those claims before 1982 and claims made against the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland under criminal injuries legislation could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Compensation paid out in respect of injuries allegedly inflicted by baton rounds fired by the Army is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Lear Fan Factory

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will receive a reply to his letters of September concerning the disposal of the Lear Fan factory and its acquisition by Iraqi interests.

Mr. Needham: A reply was sent to the hon. Member on 16 October.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Vladimir and Karmela Raiz

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Russian authorities about their continued failure to grant an exit visa to Vladimir and Karmela Raiz of Vilnius.

Mr. Waldegrave: We take every opportunity to press the Soviet authorities about Vladimir and Karmela Raiz. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs raised this case most recently when he met Mr. Shevardnadze in New York on 29 September. We shall maintain our pressure until this case is satisfactorily resolved.

George Belitsky

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government have made to the Russian authorities about their failure to grant an exit visa to George Belitsky of Vilnius whose wife and sons have been living in Israel since 1987.

Mr. Waldegrave: We take every opportunity to press the Soviet authorities on individual refusenik cases such as George Belitsky. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs raised this case most recently when he met Mr. Shevardnadze in New York on 29 September. We shall maintain our pressure until this case is satisfactorily resolved.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his response to the latest representations of the Argentine Government regarding the future of the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given today to my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell).

Argentina

Mr. David Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent talks in Madrid between British and Argentinian representatives.

Mr. Sainsbury: The talks which concluded yesterday have enabled us to resolve a number of practical issues without prejudicing the sovereignty of the Falkland islands and represent a significant step towards the normalisation of relations between the United Kingdom and Argentina. I am arranging for a copy of the communiqué to be placed in the Library of the House.

In addition, the British representative made a statement announcing our intention to extend the breadth of the territorial sea around certain dependent territories which included the Falkland Islands, South Georgia and the South Sandwich Islands.

Southern Africa Booklet

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps were taken during the preparation of the booklet, "Britain in Southern Africa —A Force for Peaceful Change and Development" to ensure that the Cabinet Office guidelines stating that Government publicity should not be personalised were observed.

Mr. Sainsbury: The booklet is in accordance with the Cabinet Office guidelines in that it is a factual statement of Government policy directed primarily at readers overseas.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the cost of producing and distributing the booklet "Britain in Southern Africa—A Force for Peaceful Change and Development".

Mr. Sainsbury: The total cost of production was £18,708 and 13,000 copies have been printed, of which 8,000 have so far been distributed overseas. The Central Office of Information distributed the booklet to diplomatic missions overseas as part of its regular distribution of information material. Distribution costs are not therefore separately identifiable.

United Nations

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out those initiatives introduced by Her Majesty's Government before the most recent general assembly of the United Nations held in September.

Mr. Sainsbury: In his speech at the United Nations general assembly on 27 September, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs set out our position on a wide range of the most important current international issues. He also took the opportunity to propose that the Geneva negotiations on chemical weapons should be conducted on a year round basis, announce the Helen Suzman scholarships for black South Africans and announce our package of assistance to the Colombian Government to pursue their anti-drugs campaign.

Afghanistan

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to meet representatives of the Government of Afghanistan.

Mr. Sainsbury: No. We look forward to the day when it is replaced by a truly representative Government with whom we could have normal relations.

China

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Maude: We and our EC partners agree that in present circumstances it would be premature to resume normal relations with China. But we have no wish to impede either people-to-people contacts, or trade on normal commercial terms.

Hong Kong

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking in relation to prisoners due to be in Hong Kong prisons on 30 July 1997, to ensure that the safeguards embodied in the Fugitive Offenders Act 1967 are complied with; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: The work of preparing local legislation to replace Acts of Parliament applied to Hong Kong, including the Fugitive Offenders Act 1967, is being undertaken. Such legislation will remain in force after the establishment of the Hong Kong Special Administrative region, on 1 July 1997, in accordance with the joint declaration. The safeguards embodied in this local legislation will apply to prisoners in Hong Kong prisons after 1 July 1997 who have been returned to Hong Kong from abroad.

THE ARTS

Merseyside Arts Association

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last met the chairman of Merseyside Arts Association to discuss the future of arts administration on Merseyside.

Mr. Luce: I have not done so.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

DRG Company

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will receive a deputation from the leaders of the work force of DRG Deeside to hear their views concerning the bid for DRG by Pembridge Investments of Bermuda; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: It is not appropriate for Ministers to comment on the merits of a merger situation in advance of the Secretary of State's decision on the question of reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. DRG will have had an opportunity to make representations about the bid by Pembridge Investments to the Director General of Fair Trading whose advice to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the question of reference to the Commission will reflect those representations.

Offshore Purchasers

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received asking for legislation to forbid offshore purchasers of a group of companies selling its constituent businesses free of tax at the corporate level; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: I have received a number of representations on this issue from hon. Members and others, but the matter is one which falls to be considered by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, rather than by me.

British Shipbuilders

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will provide an estimate of the commercial cost to British Shipbuilders of the closure of North East Shipbuilders, separately identifying (a) redundancy payments, (b) closure bonus payments, (c)

care and maintenance of the facilities since vessel construction ceased, (d) all costs incurred by British Shipbuilders in dealing with prospective purchasers of the facilities and (e) any other costs;

(2) if he will provide an estimate of the cost to Her Majesty's Government of the closure of North East Shipbuilders Ltd., excluding commercial costs to British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The accounts for North East Shipbuilders Ltd. for 1987-88 were prepared on a closure basis following the decision announced by the then Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 7 December 1988. Signed on 31 January 1989, provision for estimated extraordinary losses of £53·7 million was made on account of closure. The provision included £28·5 million for redundancy payments and £5 million for closure bonus payments. These closure costs could only have been avoided had disposal retaining the whole of the work force proved possible based on bids received in 1988.

Offset by forecast receipts from the disposal of assets, the greater part of the £19·8 million for other costs reflected in the provision related to unrecovered labour and overheads. These were estimated by convention from 1 April 1988, the beginning of the following financial year. A considerable proportion of these costs had been incurred by December 1988, were irrespective of the decisions taken then, and could not have been avoided for some time thereafter even if sale negotiations had commenced at that time. Moreover, had a decision to open negotiations for shipbuilding been taken in July 1989, costs up to the early part of next year would not have been avoided on account of the Commission's expected procedure. British Shipbuilders regard more detailed information on other costs as commercially confidential.

In addition to costs at NESL, disposal talks both before the end of 1988 and in 1989 have involved senior corporation staff for a proportion of their time. Their salaries and related overheads would, however, have been incurred whatever decisions were taken in December 1988 and in July 1989. Fees for financial advice to British Shipbuilders on NESL are additional but are commercially confidential.

All costs incurred by British Shipbuilders net of trading income are funded by Her Majesty's Government.

Cellular Radiophones

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to ensure that the cellular radiophone networks cover all the United Kingdom.

Mr. Forth: The two cellular radio operators were obliged by their operating licences to provide services in an area where 90 per cent. of the United Kingdom population live by the end of 1989. This target was achieved during 1987. Expansion has continued since then and now stands at over 94 per cent. In the light of this, I have no plans to impose a further coverage requirement on the cellular operators.

Mr. Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to seek to ensure that cellular telephone companies publish a map with any of their advertisements indicating the areas of the United Kingdom covered by their cellular radio networks.

Mr. Forth: Both of the cellular radio operators publish detailed maps of the areas covered by their networks, and these are made available to the public without charge. The Office of Telecommunications is also issuing a users guide for cellular radio, available from next week, which will include coverage maps.

I therefore have no plans to oblige the operators to include such maps in their advertisements.

Glass

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the form of a table (a) the amount of glass recycled by each west European country in 1988 and (b) the amount of glass recycled as a percentage of the total amount of glass used for packaging for each country.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The information is in the table.

Western Europe glass recycling figures for 1988

Country	Tonnes of glass recycled	Percentage of total amount of glass used for packaging
Austria	98,000	50
Belgium	166,000	50
Denmark	46,000	27
Finland	2,000	3
France	676,000	34
West Germany	1,176,000	39
United Kingdom	264,000	16
Greece	14,000	16
Ireland	9,000	10
Italy	610,000	40
Netherlands	261,000	53
Norway	3,000	6
Portugal	31,000	13
Spain	278,000	23
Sweden	31,000	22
Switzerland	156,000	55

Note:
The European figures were provided by FEVE—the European Glass Containers Federation. The United Kingdom figure was provided by the British Glass Manufacturers Confederation.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what amount of cullet was imported into the United Kingdom in 1988.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 19 October 1989]: A total of 11,000 tonnes of cullet was imported into the United Kingdom in 1988.

HEALTH

London Ambulance Service

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has, and what action he has taken, concerning possible contracting out of the non-emergency services of the London ambulance service; what organisations and persons he has approached concerning any such proposals; and what response he has received.

Mr. Freeman: The management of the London ambulance service is the responsibility of the South West Thames regional health authority to which I refer the hon. Member.

DEFENCE

Goose Bay

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of (a) bombing flights, (b) low-flying exercises and (c) personnel deployed by the RAF at Goose Bay for each year since 1983.

Mr. Neubert: I have nothing to add to the information on low-level training sorties carried out by the RAF at Goose Bay provided on 10 May at columns 472-73 and, by my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) on 23 November 1987 at column 31 to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas). The number of personnel deployed by the Royal Air Force at Goose Bay at any one time is within the maximum of 350 personnel permitted by the multilateral memorandum of understanding which covers the use of Goose Bay.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment of environmental impact and impact on human life from the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation base at Goose Bay has been made by his Department.

Mr. Neubert: None. The environmental impact of the use of the Canadian forces base at Goose Bay is a matter for the Canadian authorities.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received concerning the use of Goose Bay as a North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and RAF training base; and if he will make a statement on its future use.

Mr. Neubert: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations concerning the use of Goose Bay. The RAF, in common with some other members of NATO, makes use of the Canadian facilities at Goose Bay from time to time. This is at the invitation of the Canadian Government, who are responsible for all use, including future use, of the area and its airspace. The RAF continues to value highly the use of the facilities at Goose Bay.

Innu Indians, Labrador

Mr. Corbyn To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will meet representatives of the Innu Indians of Labrador when they visit the United Kingdom on 30 October.

Mr. Neubert: No. Matters affecting Labrador, Canada, including the interests of the native Indian population, are the responsibility of the Canadian authorities.

Armed Forces Personnel (Sentences)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the armed forces have been permitted to return to their duties after (a) serving custodial sentences, (b) receiving suspended sentences and (c) being fined by the criminal courts for the latest convenient period.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I will write to the hon. Member.

Fylingdales (Inspection Access)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to respond positively to the proposal announced by Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze in Jackson Hole, Wyoming, on 24 September, that the Soviet Union should be permitted full inspection access to the radar monitoring facility at Fylingdales in Yorkshire.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government have received no request for access by the Soviet Union to the ballistic missile early warning facility at RAF Fylingdales. Soviet concerns about RAF Fylingdales are a legal matter of treaty interpretation and would therefore not be resolved by an inspection of the radars. If, however, the parties to the anti-ballistic missile treaty considered that a visit would be helpful in allaying Soviet concerns, then the Government would consider such a request in the light of the terms of the approach.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Recycled Paper

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Lord President of the Council what action is being taken to promote the use of recycled paper for House of Commons notepaper, envelopes, and other stationery.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Many of the stationery items supplied to the House are already made from recycled material. The Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee is fully aware of the need to increase the use of recycled paper at every suitable opportunity and has decided to re-examine the practicability of its use for the first-class stationery used by right hon. and hon. Members this autumn.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Birmingham County Court

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Attorney-General how many clerical staff in Birmingham county court have resigned in each month of the current financial year.

The Attorney-General: The number of staff that have resigned in each month of the current financial year is as follows:

	Number
April	4
May	2
June	3
July	5
August	6
September	11
October	5
Total	36

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Attorney-General how many staff the unit value attached to Birmingham county court indicates should be in post, by grade; and how many are presently in post.

The Attorney-General: The number of staff allocated to individual courts is not determined on the basis of unit values.

Each circuit is allocated an authorised level of staff and the number and grade then allocated to each court is based on relative workloads.

The authorised staff ceiling of 180 for Birmingham county court has been maintained at or very close to that figure.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the time taken at Birmingham county court to process correspondence and to obtain hearings.

The Attorney-General: There are no records kept on the time correspondence, including letters requesting hearings, takes to process. Requests to issue summonses, warrants, divorce petitions and for judgment to be entered are dealt with within five days. Over recent months it has been difficult to deal with all items of correspondence within a reasonable time although it is understood that any matters requiring urgent appointments are being appropriately dealt with. Action has been put in hand to deal with the arrears as quickly as possible.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Attorney-General what at the latest convenient date was the number of (a) casual and (b) relief staff, by job title or group, employed at Birmingham county court.

The Attorney-General: (a) Casual Staff

As of 1 October 1989, the number and grade of casual staff employed at Birmingham county court were:

	Number
Administrative Officer	2
Administrative Assistant	4
Support Grade Band 2	1

The average number of casuals employed during August and September was 15.

(b) Relief Staff

Between three and five relief staff at AO level have been provided by other courts since late July. A further relief team of six AOs and a team leader will be working at Birmingham from 16 October for one month.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Attorney-General what at the latest convenient date was the number of items of outstanding correspondence awaiting attention at Birmingham county court; and what was the position one and two years earlier.

The Attorney-General: At 17 October 1989 there were approximately 11,600 items of correspondence awaiting action. There were no significant arrears of correspondence in either of the previous years.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Attorney-General what on average is the time taken to deal with routine correspondence at Birmingham county court; and what was the position one and two years ago.

The Attorney-General: No measure of the average time taken to deal with correspondence is kept. There were no significant problems in general terms in either of the two previous years.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Attorney-General whether he will detail the current staff ceiling, broken down by grade, at Birmingham county court; and what was the position one and two years earlier.

The Attorney-General: The information requested is set out in the table. Staff ceilings are set annually, and reviewed at least quarterly by group managers.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Attorney-General whether he will quantify the amount of (a) "targeted" and (b) "non-targeted" work currently undertaken at Birmingham county court; and what was the workload one and two years earlier.

The Attorney-General: The information is not kept in the form requested. The total workload of the county court measured by unit values for the financial years 1986 to 1989 was:

	Unit values
March 1986-87	461,440
March 1987-88	478,083
March 1988-89	453,795
September 1989	493,448

The figures show a 8·7 per cent. increase in workload between March and September 1989.

PRIME MINISTER

Non-proliferation Treaty

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if, during her meeting with President Gorbachev in the Soviet Union in September, she raised the opportunities available to the depository states for the nuclear non-proliferation treaty to increase treaty membership and strengthen compliance before the fourth nuclear non-proliferation treaty review conference next August;

(2) if, during her meeting with President Mitterrand of France on 1 September, she discussed the prospects of France joining the nuclear non-proliferation treaty in the period before the fourth non-proliferation treaty review conference to be held in summer 1990;

(3) if, during her visit to Japan in September, she raised with members of the Japanese Government the co-operation on nuclear technology and nuclear fuels sales between Japan and the United Kingdom, pursuant to articles III and IV of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and initiatives to be jointly promoted by Her Majesty's Government and the Japanese Government on strengthening the non-proliferation treaty before and at its fourth review conference next August.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

No.

Defence Minister Yazov

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what issues she discussed with visiting Soviet Defence Minister Yazov on 25 July at Downing street; and what plans there are for the Chief of the Defence Staff, the First Sea Lords, an Admiral of the Fleet or a Defence Minister to visit the Soviet Union.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

At the meeting my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister held with General Yazov on 25 July, matters of mutual interest were discussed. Discussions are continuing on our future defence contacts with the USSR. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence hopes to visit the Soviet Union next year.

Nuclear Non-proliferation

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what opportunities she had to raise nuclear non-proliferation and the NPT fourth review conference, to be held next summer, in meetings with foreign heads of state or heads of Government, since 28 July.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

I understand that these matters have not figured on the agenda of any meetings which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has had since 28 July with foreign heads of state or Heads of Government.

Downing Street (Barrier)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister whether she was consulted over the building of a barrier at the entrance to Downing street; why it was considered that the existing security measures are not adequate; and what are the full costs of the proposed construction.

Sir Geoffrey Howe [holding answer 19 October]: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was of course consulted about the security improvements to Downing street as were other Ministers and organisations with a close interest.

It is not the Government's practice to comment on the operational aspects or detailed costs of security measures.

SCOTLAND

Lithotriptor Centre

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the administrative cost to both the National Health Service and the SHHD of the new invoicing system created between the Scottish lithotriptor centre and customer boards.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The invoicing system is a pilot scheme which still has some months to run.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what fees are to be charged to private patients for treatment at the Scottish lithotriptor centre; and what proportion of fee will be paid to consultants.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally. The charging of fees to private patients is entirely a matter for Lothian health board and for the consultants concerned.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his assessment of the number of private patients treated monthly at the Scottish lithotriptor centre.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have made no such assessment. Lothian health board is fully aware that treatment of private patients must not interrupt the service to NHS patients.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland under what statutory powers the SHHD acted when instructing that the Scottish lithotriptor centre be self-funding in 1989-90.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The new arrangements for funding the lithotriptor were introduced administratively after discussions with health boards.

Women General Practitioners

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many women general practitioners there were in (a) Scotland, (b) the Strathclyde region and (c) Greater Glasgow for each year since 1974.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 18 October 1989]: The information is available in the form requested only since 1976, as set out in the table.

Female General Medical Practitioners (unrestricted principals only)

Year	Scotland	Strathclyde region	Greater Glasgow
1976	443	210	131

Ambulance Staff

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is for each year since 1974 the number of ambulance staff working for the National Health Service in (a) Scotland, (b) the Strathclyde region and (c) Greater Glasgow.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 18 October 1989]: The number of ambulance crews in post in the Scottish ambulance service as at 31 March each year was as follows:

Year[1]	Scotland (including Greater Glasgow ambulance area)	Greater Glasgow ambulance area
1978	1,386	296
1979	1,558	311
1980	1,626	316
1981	1,647	322
1982	1,665	321
1983	1,698	317
1984	1,705	304
1985	1,724	303

Year[1]	Scotland (including Greater Glasgow ambulance area)	Greater Glasgow ambulance area
1986	1,744	307
1987	1,761	305
1988	1,809	296
1989	1,833	287

[1] Information prior to 1978 is not available.

No figures are available for Strathclyde region as it encompasses two whole ambulance areas and parts of a number of others.

EMPLOYMENT

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which of the training and enterprise councils, or proposals for training and enterprise councils have honourable Members on the board; and if he will identify the honourable Members.

Mr. Nicholls: There are no hon. Members included on the boards of prospective training and enterprise councils, nor are any included in proposals for training and enterprise councils.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the detailed arrangements for provision of employment training and YTS under training and enterprise councils.

Mr. Nicholls: The detailed arrangements for provision of employment training and YTS under training and enterprise councils will be published shortly.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total amount of public money that the TECs have received for development funding; and if he will provide an itemised breakdown.

Mr. Nicholls: To date a total of some £2,500,000 for funding has been agreed with 22 prospective TECs. These are itemised in the table.

Young People (Remuneration)

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how the Government intend to comply with the requirement of article 24 of the draft social charter that young people of more than 16 years of age who are in gainful employment should receive equitable remuneration.

Mr. Eggar: The European Commission's draft social charter is still under discussion by member states.

Wages

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the underpayment figures, regionally, for underpayment of wages in 1987 and 1988, and the percentage of establishments visited by the inspectorate in the regions which were underpaying in 1987 and 1988.

Mr. Nicholls: The information for 1987 is contained in the reply given on 4 March 1988 in the Official Report at columns 731-36. The information for 1988 is in the reply given on 1 March 1989 in the Official Report at columns 201-6.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if there is a level of wages which the Government treats as excessively low.

Mr. Nicholls: Pay generally is a matter for employers and their employees to decide for themselves in the light of all the relevant circumstances.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment in the light of the increase in illegal underpayment cases in 1988, what the Government intend to do to halt this trend.

Mr. Nicholls: The general level of compliance with wages orders remains consistently high. The percentage of workers found to be paid at least the statutory minimum due in checks conducted by the wages inspectorate in 1987 was 96·9 per cent. and 1988 was 96·6 per cent.

Wages Councils

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what evidence he has that abolition of the wages councils will result directly in employment growth; and if he will publish it.

Mr. Nicholls: Studies supporting the Government's view that the abolition of wages councils would have a favourable effect on employment have been listed in previous parliamentary answers in the Official Report on 21 February 1985 at column 516 and on 18 June 1985 at column 92.

Crown Immunity

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will now introduce legislation to remove Crown immunity from Crown bodies other than health authorities.

Mr. Lace: I have been asked to reply.

The Government's policy in respect of Crown immunity is that it should not lead to lower standards being accepted in Crown premises. This is reviewed in individual cases where there appears to be evidence of cause for concern.

Low Pay

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many inspectors were in charge of low pay cases for each year since 1974.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 18 October 1989]: The Department inspects pay levels only where statutory minimum rates set by wages councils are in force. The average number of inspectors in post for this purpose in each of the years in question was:

Year	Number
1974	135
1975	128
1976	125
1977	132
1978	143
1979	158
1980	155
1981	117
1982	116
1983	116
1984	115
1985	120
1986	116
1987	73
1988	70

The reduction in the number of inspectors in 1987 reflected the simpler and quicker task of checking compliance with wage orders and the rise in the general level of compliance following the reform of the wages council system in 1986.

Career Development Loans

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will place in the Library details of the career development loans scheme, and any evaluation carried out by his Department of the scheme.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 17 October 1989]: The Government launched career development loans nationally in July 1988, and details were placed in the Library of the House at that time. External evaluation is planned for 1990-91. I will write to the hon. Member about the evaluation of the pilot carried out by my Department and place a copy in the Library of the House.

ENERGY

European Community (Nuclear Generation)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy to introduce a paper to the European Council of Energy Ministers meeting in Luxembourg on 30 October to eliminate all state subsidies of the nuclear generating and nuclear fuel cycle industries in the European Community, as part of progress towards free competition in the energy markets in the European Community from 1 January 1993.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have no plans to do so. However, the Commission is currently collecting information from member states about state aids and other Government assistance to the Community electricity and nuclear industries.

European Co-operation

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to introduce new initiatives for European co-operation on (a) renewable energy technologies, (b) fast breeder nuclear technology and (c) fusion reactor technology at the next Council of European Energy Ministers meeting in Luxembourg on 30 October.

Mr. Michael Spicer: There is already an active programme of collaboration within the EEC on research and demonstration programmes in renewable energy technologies. During its Presidency the United Kingdom initiated a series of exchanges within the EEC on renewable energy. As a result senior scientific advisers from each member state now meet regularly to exchange information and to co-ordinate programmes within the Community.

The Council will be discussing a Commission proposal, for a further five-year programme to promote energy technology in Europe, which includes support for work on renewable energy sources. The Commission has also submitted proposals for a new framework programme on research and development which includes work on all the technologies mentioned. This will be discussed by the Community's research council.

Plutonium (Sellafield)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will provide published data in the Official Report giving (a) the total in kilogrammes of the amount of plutonium in all wastes on the Sellafield site resulting from the reprocessing of all Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board Magnox spent fuel up to 31 December 1986, (b) the accuracy of the figure in (a), and (c) how much of the figure in (a) is included in the table giving the allocation of plutonium produced in Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board Magnox reactors as of 31 March 1987, Official Report, 24 July 1987, column 516.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave him on 18 July 1989 at columns 79-80.

National Power

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if National Power will retain the ownership of all nuclear waste in the categories of low, intermediate and high level solid and liquid radioactive wastes arising from their nuclear stations and after reprocessing, when the Central Electricity Generating Board is privatised.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate requires the licensee to make satisfactory arrangements for the treatment, storage and ultimate disposal of spent fuel and nuclear waste. This will not change after privatisation.

United Kingdom Nirex Ltd

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what will be the constitution of the board of United Kingdom Nirex Ltd, following the privatisation of the Central Electricity Generating Board.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No decisions have yet been taken on the CEGB's present shareholding in Nirex after privatisation.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

World Bank (Environmental Protection)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives have been taken by Her Majesty's Government's representatives at the World Bank to increase the activities of the bank in global environmental protection and environmental development; and what policies on the environment the World Bank currently pursues.

Mrs. Chalker: United Kingdom representatives have been at the forefront in urging the Bank to increase its attention to environmental matters, most recently at last month's development committee meeting. The Bank has made admirable progress in assessing the environmental problems of developing countries and in devising appropriate policies. We shall continue to press for further progress.

On the question of global environmental protection, the development committee welcomed the Bank's increasing emphasis on energy conservation and efficiency, and encouraged the Bank to assist countries in introducing alternatives to chlorofluorocarbons.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Animal Foodstuffs (Labelling)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure that the regulations relating to mandatory labelling of ingredients on animal foodstuffs are adhered to.

Mr. Maclean: The European Council of Ministers is currently considering a proposal which will require suppliers of animal feeds to declare the materials of categories of materials used in them to supplement existing detailed labelling requirements. Any new measures will be enacted in United Kingdom legislation under the Agriculture Act 1970, which will continue to be enforced by local authorities.

Eggs

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest figures for the consumption and production of eggs in Great Britain; what were the figures for production and consumption 12 months prior to that date; and if he will make a statement on the future of egg production in Great Britain.

Mr. Gummer: The latest available data are as follows: Consumption of eggs in Great Britain for the second quarter of 1989 was 2·41 eggs per person per week per household (source: National Food Survey). The egg packing survey shows throughput by packing stations in Great Britain for the four weeks ending 1 October totalling 2,149 thousand boxes. These figures compare with equivalent figures for 1988 of 2·74 eggs per person per week for household consumption of eggs and 2,384 thousand boxes for throughput at packing stations in Great Britain.

Our comprehensive package of measures to combat the risk of salmonella in eggs should enable consumer confidence in eggs to be restored and our egg market to strengthen to the benefit of producers.

Crayfish Plague

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will seek the advice of the National Rivers Authority on possible methods of combating crayfish plague.

Mr. Gummer: I have asked the National Rivers Authority for any advice the authority has to offer. This fungal disease established itself in many of our main crayfish rivers some years ago. Our view remains that practical controls for containing or eradicating crayfish plague—which attacks wild fish in their natural environment—would be very difficult to achieve and would be of doubtful effectiveness.

Butter and Meat Distribution

Mr. Madden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will name all organisations which have distributed butter, released from EEC stores, in Bradford in the last two years; and what representations he has received concerning the fairness and efficiency of the distribution of butter.

Mr. MacLean: A list of the organisations originally designed to participate in the scheme was placed in the Library of the House on 21 April 1988. Of these the following are based in Bradford:

Islamic Missionary College
Blenheim Mosque
Jamiyat Tabligh Ul Islam
Suffa Tul Islam
Bierley Community Centre

Over the two years during which the scheme has been operating, we have received a number of representations about it. Most of these have been about the uneven availability of produce, the exclusion of pensioners as a group from the scheme and the allocation of produce to ethnic minority groups.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps when butter or meat is next released from EEC stores for distribution free within the United Kingdom to ensure that wide publicity is given in advance of distribution giving information about entitlement to receive butter and meat; and if he will also ensure that distribution arrangements are widely publicised to ensure maximum take-up by those entitled to receive butter and meat.

Mr. MacLean: The arrangements for publicising local distributions of surplus produce is a matter for the participating organisations concerned to determine in the light of their knowledge of local needs. Given that the produce available is being fully utilised I have no reason to believe that the current arrangements are inadequate.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when butter and meat will next be released from EEC stores for distribution free within the United Kingdom; who will be eligible to receive butter and meat; and what arrangements he will make to ensure such distribution is conducted fairly and efficiently (a) in Bradford and (b) elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: The release of produce from stores and its distribution to eligible recipients has been, and will continue to be, timed to accord with the arrangements made by the organisations operating the scheme. These arrangements will continue until the current scheme runs out. Beyond that, the Commission has made no proposals for a scheme in 1990, but intervention stocks have been much reduced, and the Commission is to review the arrangements next year.

Those eligible to receive produce under the current scheme will continue to be the most needy in our community, that is, those on income support or family credit and those living in welfare hostels or who have no fixed abode.

When this scheme was set up, it was decided that the produce would be distributed by voluntary organisations who wished, and had the expertise and facilities, to do so. Designated organisations have clear instructions about eligibility and procedures for distribution. Staff of the agricultural department monitor distributions to ensure that they are conducted in accordance with the rules. The voluntary nature of the scheme makes it impossible to ensure an even geographical distribution of the produce.

Nitrogen-based Fertilisers

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to conduct a study of the implications of the release of methane gas from the use of nitrogen-based fertilisers in the United Kingdom for the greenhouse effect global warming.

Mr. MacLean: Methane gas is a product of decomposition. Its agricultural source is ruminant digestion rather than the use of nitrogen-based fertilisers. The Ministry is investigating agricultural sources of greenhouse gases.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC Economic and Finance Council

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the latest meeting of the European Community's Economic and Finance Council.

Mr. Lawson: The Ecofin Council met in Luxembourg on 9 October. The Financial Secretary represented the United Kingdom.

The Council discussed the abolition of fiscal frontiers, where outline agreement was reached on a number of technical issues to pave the way for the removal of frontier controls related to VAT, in particular the importance of retaining the destination principle. There will be a further discussion at the November Ecofin. The taxation of savings was also discussed, and it was agreed that the Commission should bring forward draft outline proposals on measures to strengthen mutual assistance and to combat tax fraud, for discussion at the meeting of Ecofin in November. It was agreed to send a letter to the European investment bank inviting it to make loan finance available to Poland and Hungary under the bank's normal criteria for lending from its own resources. The Commission's proposals for borrowing under the new Community instrument and through Euratom were also discussed, but no agreement was reached.

Energy Conservation

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to remove value added tax from insulation materials used to improve energy conservation in buildings.

Mr. Ryder: Zero-rating already exists for new dwellings and so insulation materials are relieved when they are installed in the course of construction by a VAT-registered builder. VAT-registered owners of new or existing commercial buildings can normally reclaim, under the normal input tax rules, any tax they are charged for insulation work or materials. Even if the cost of a general relief were acceptable in terms of revenue forgone and additional administration, any such relief would not be permissible under the EC sixth VAT directive. Thus the Government have no plans for a general relief for the insulation of existing dwellings either by contractors or on a DIY basis.

Customs Officers

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out the powers and responsibilities of customs officers when questioning United Kingdom citizens arriving at ports of entry.

Mr. Ryder: Customs officers' powers and responsibilities are set out in the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979. Under section 78 of that Act an officer may require a passenger to produce for examination his baggage and anything contained therein and to answer questions in respect of such items.

Customs officers must also have regard to the relevant provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and its codes of practice.

Manufacturing Industry (Investment)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will tabulate the investment made by British institutions in manufacturing industry outside the United Kingdom during 1988 together with the comparable amounts of inward investment including for each case the respective geographical areas and manufacturing sectors.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 17 October 1989]: The available information relates to United Kingdom net direct investment overseas in manufacturing industry and overseas net direct investment in United Kingdom manufacturing industry and was published in tables 1.6 and 2.6 of "Business Monitor MA4 1987, Overseas Transactions", a copy of which is in the Library. Comparable information for 1988 should become available next spring. No information is available on overseas portfolio investment by country or by industry.

African Elephants

Mr. Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to identify African elephant products in the overseas trade statistics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The main trade in elephant products is in ivory. Currently, trade in both new and worked ivory is identified in the Overseas Trade Statistics.

Trade is not normally allowed in Indian elephant ivory under the convention on international trade in endangered species of fauna and flora (CITES). Similar strict controls will now apply to African elephant ivory following agreement this week at the CITES conference.

In the United Kingdom, strict controls were introduced on imports of ivory from 9 June 1989. From 17 August 1989, these controls have been applied in the European Community under Commission Regulation 2496/89.

Figures relating to trade in goods included under CITES are published by the European Commission.

Ivory

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is now in a position to give details regarding the five consignments of raw ivory which were being held at Heathrow airport when he replied to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West on 6 June, Official Report, column 118.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 18 October 1989]: The position remains as outlined in the answer given to the hon. Member on 6 June at column 118.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has regarding seizures of ivory at ports of entry since 12 April.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 18 October 1989]: Customs continue to seize consignments of illegally imported ivory.

Most seizures, often involving small quantities, are made locally without reference to Customs HQ. Statistical information is compiled only periodically. Up-to-date details could be obtained only at disproportionate expense.

Inflation and Interest Rates

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the average levels of inflation and interest rates in (a) Denmark, (b) Canada, (c) France, (d) Holland, (e) the Federal Republic of Germany, (f) Japan, (g) the United States of America and (h) Sweden for each year since 1979.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 18 October 1989]: The average levels of inflation since 1979 for Denmark, Canada, France, the Netherlands, Germany, Japan, the United States and Sweden are given in "OECD Economic Outlook June 1989", a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library. The information requested on interest rates is as follows:

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which Minister in his Department is responsible for day-to-day management of his Department's information technology strategy; and what proportion of his time was spent on this matter in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The Minister responsible for oversight of Her Majesty's Treasury's information technology strategy is the Paymaster General. Officials are responsible for the day-to-day management of the strategy. No strategic issue required the attention of the Paymaster General in the month up to Friday 13 October.

Economic Statistics

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the annual percentage growth each year since 1979 in (a) real incomes, (b) the stock of consumer debt outstanding in real terms, (c) consumer spending and (d) output in the economy.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The 1989 edition of "United Kingdom National Accounts"—otherwise known as the CSO Blue Book—gives annual estimates of real personal disposable income (Table 4.1), consumers' expenditure at constant prices (Table 4.6) and of United Kingdom output (Table 2.4). A copy is available in the Library. Figures of the annual percentage growth of the stock of consumer credit, expressed in real terms, are as follows:

	Growth
1979	7·9
1980	3·2
1981	9·4
1982	−6·6
1983	12·3
1984	12·2
1985	11·7
1986	12·3
1987	15·5
1988	10·9

Low Pay

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will instruct all Government Departments concerned to review the present pay structures of low-paid workers within their responsibilities with a view to giving them a parity with police and armed forces personnel.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 19 October 1989]: No.

Electricity

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total cost to the United Kingdom's balance of payments in pounds sterling in the latest available year of the purchase by the Central Electricity Generating Board of electricity from France.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have been asked to reply.

The provisional value (on a cost, insurance and freight basis) of imports of electricity from France to the United Kingdom in 1988 was £268 million.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Salman Rushdie

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost in each month since January for the special protection measures taken on behalf of Mr. Salman Rushdie.

Mr. Hurd: It would not be proper to disclose information about police protection which would indicate its scale in a particular case.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about trends in Metropolitan police manpower since 1979.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Since 1979 the trend in Metropolitan police manpower has been steadily upwards. At the end of August 1989 the strength of the force was 28,240—25 per cent. higher than at the end of 1979. In addition, there are now some 1,300 more civil staff supporting the Metropolitan police than there were at the end of 1979; and civilianisation has released more than 300 police officers for operational duty over the last three years, and is expected to release a further 200 in 1989-90. This steady increase in manpower reflects our sustained commitment to building up the strength and efficiency of the police.

West Midlands Chief Constable

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chief constable of the West Midlands; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Hurd: I met the chief constable on 5 September, when I attended the "Fire 89" conference in Birmingham. We discussed a number of matters concerning policing in England and Wales.

Arrests (Football Grounds)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to how many people were arrested during the 1988-89 season at the grounds of each of the clubs playing in each of the four divisions of the Football League; and what are the comparable statistics for the previous two seasons.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) collate the number of arrests made at Football League matches in England and Wales. The table shows ACPO's figures for arrests at home games of league clubs according to their division in the 1988-89 season. The figures do not distinguish between arrests of home or away spectators. Such figures are not collated centrally, nor are any relating to the outcome of these arrests.

Lotteries

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has recently reviewed the present legislation governing the conduct of lotteries; if he has any proposals for the amendment of the law; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We keep the law governing the conduct of lotteries under review, and have no current proposals for its amendment.

On-line Betting

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to address the development of technology which makes possible on-line betting with the use of pre-purchase or credit cards and a television receiver; what consideration he is giving to the transmission of such facilities to Britain via satellite television, and if he has any proposals to amend the law.

Mr. John Patten: Both credit and cash betting are already regulated by the current law. Similarly, television coverage of those sporting events on which punters most usually bet is already established. We would expect any technological developments in bookmaking to be designed to comply with the current law; and we have received no proposals for changes in the law to accommodate any such development which, if it were introduced, might at present be unlawful.

Emergency Services (Accident Procedures)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines exist for the emergency services which may come into contact with blood after an accident; and if he will seek to ensure that a standard procedure is followed at all times to protect personnel regardless of the personal circumstances of victims involved.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Contact with blood after an accident may expose members of the emergency services to the risk of contracting one of the blood-borne infectious diseases. Guidance on the operational safety precautions which should be taken to reduce this risk is given in the circulars which the Home Office has issued to police forces and fire brigades on AIDS and hepatitis B. Guidance for the ambulance services is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in light of evidence that HIV is spreading now faster among heterosexuals than homosexuals and to avoid possible distress to relatives, he will ensure that messages sent to emergency services after accidents or similar disasters do not refer to victims' sexuality as a reason for taking additional precautions because of a fear of AIDS.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: While all the emergency services have been issued with general guidance about AIDS, there is normally no question of their messages making any reference to victims' sexuality.

Serious Crime Squad (West Midlands)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to whether any former members of the serious crime squad recently transferred to non-operational duties have since been involved in criminal investigations.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. The actions of the former serious crime squad are being investigated under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority by Mr. Shaw, assistant chief constable of the West Yorkshire police, to whom all matters of concern should be reported.

On 14 August the chief constable of the West Midlands stated publicly that all officers who had served on the serious crime squad in the period 1 January 1986 to 31 December 1988 would be moved out of the CID to non-operational duty. The term "non-operational duty" covers all manner of duty other than the arrest of persons for crime or the interrogation of persons in respect of offences for which they have or may have to answer before a court. I have no evidence to suggest that the criteria outlined have been breached.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands listing the members of the serious crime squad at the time it was disbanded and the dates on which they joined the squad.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to how many members of the serious crime squad who were recently transferred to non-operational duties are currently on sick leave;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to the date on which Detective Sergeant Michael Honby went on sick leave and on the prospects for his return to duty.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. These are matters for the chief constable of the West Midlands, and my right hon. Friend sees no call for a report on them at the present time.

Illegal Drugs

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ensure that moneys recovered from illegal drug operations under the provisions of the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986 are allocated explicitly for the purpose of combating the use and distribution of illicit drugs.

Mr. John Patten: Ministers are considering the detailed arrangements whereby a proportion of the sums confiscated from drug traffickers as a result of international agreements might be used to strengthen the United Kingdom's enforcement and other efforts to curb drug abuse.

PRIME MINISTER

Chernobyl

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Prime Minister if she will discuss during her next meeting with President Gorbachev compensation for the economic damage done to upland farming by the radioactive fall-out from the Chernobyl accident.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister did not raise this issue when she met President Gorbachev last month. The position with regard to compensation remains as stated in the reply to the hon. Member for Merionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) of 21 July 1986 at column 5.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Antarctic Treaty

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of negotiations on liability protocols in relation to the Antarctic treaty at the Paris meeting.

Mr. Sainsbury: It was agreed in Paris last week that a meeting should be held next year to explore all proposals relating to the liability protocol required under article 8(7) of the Antarctic minerals convention.

CIVIL SERVICE

Civil Servants (Attributable Interviews)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what guidelines exist for the granting of specific civil servants of attributable interviews to newspapers and radio containing policy statements determined by Ministers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce [holding answer 20 October 1989]: The principles governing civil servants' contacts with the media are set out in chapter 6, sections 2 and 4, of the personnel management handbook. Copies of the handbook are available in the House Libraries. Advice on specific cases is given by departmental information officers.

THE ARTS

British Library

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister for the Arts what is the present budgeted cost for the completion of the new British Library.

Mr. Luce: As I reported to the House last November, Phase 1A of the new British Library at St. Pancras is currently under construction, and is to be built within a cost target in cash of £500 million. Additionally, a completion state which is at present being designed, has been budgeted at £90 million at second quarter 1988 prices.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Recycling

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what policy initiatives have been taken by his Department to increase the level of recycling materials in the United Kingdom; and if he has met the Association of County Councils, the metropolitan authorities or the relevant trades unions to discuss policy options in the recycling field.

Mr. Forth: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 17 October at column 12. The Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils, and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities are members of the advisory group referred to in that reply.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the form of a table the number of bottle banks in each west European country for the most recent date for which figures are available.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 19 October 1989]: No figures are kept for the number of bottle banks in each west European country. However, in the United Kingdom there are currently 3,830 bottle banks.
Source: British Glass Manufacturers Confederation.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the form of a table (a) the amount of metal recovered from cans by each west European country in 1988 and (b) the amount of metal recovered as a percentage of the total amount of metal consumed in cans for each country.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Accurate statistics for the amount of metal cans recycled in each west European country in 1988 are not available. However, in 1988 in the United Kingdom an estimated 950 million steel cans were recycled, equivalent to 8 per cent. of production, and 470 tonnes of aluminium cans were recycled, equivalent to 1 per cent. of production.

Import Licensing (Relocation)

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will relocate the import licensing branch of his Department to Billingham in Cleveland.

Mr. Forth: The DTI has a programme of reviews in progress to examine the scope for relocating activities away from London and the south-east. Decisions have already been made to move the Patent Office to south Wales and parts of the insolvency service to Birmingham. The import licensing branch of my Department is one of a number of further areas included in the programme of reviews.

Companies Act Investigation

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take action under the Companies Acts to investigate the roles of, and relationship between, Mr. Julian Hodgson of Henderson Crosthwaite and Mr. Ian Kennedy of Govett Strategic Investment Trust in relation to the bids for DRG plc by Pembridge Investments of Bermuda and for Tilbury plc by FJC Lilley plc, and in relation to the Govett Strategic Investment Trust stakes in Marley plc and London International Group plc; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: I know of no reason for doing so but shall consider any information my hon. Friend may have about these matters.

German Democratic Republic (Imports)

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of imports into the European Economic Community comprised products and goods imported from the German Democratic Republic in the latest available year.

Mr. Redwood: In 1988, 1·2 per cent. of EC imports, disregarding trade within the Community, were from the German Democratic Republic.

Investors Compensation

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has about the operation of the investors compensation scheme to date, as to how many failures it has dealt with and as to what the current situation is in each; and if he will make a statement on the speed and fairness of the compensation paid or offered to date.

Mr. Redwood: To date the Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd. has made payments amounting to £2·049 million to investors in five companies. Questions relating to the operation of the scheme are a matter for the scheme itself and the Securities and Investments Board.

Petrol Retailing

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on petrol retailing.

Mr. Redwood: Following representations from the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, the Secretary of State has agreed that the reporting period should be extended to 20 December 1989.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has now received the Silberston report on the future of the multi-fibre arrangement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) on 19 October 1989 at column 176.

ENERGY

Electricity Sales

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of the total amount of electricity sold by the Central Electricity Generating Board in its last available accounting year came from (a) power stations owned and operated by the board and (b) electricity purchased from France.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The information requested by the right hon. Member is contained in the Central Electricity Generating Board's 1987-88 annual report and accounts, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. In 1987-88, 95 per cent. of electricity sold by the CEGB was produced by its own power stations and 5 per cent. was imported from France.

Magnox Power Stations

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has now set aside funds for the decommissioning of Britain's Magnox stations and disposing of the wastes arising.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will make a statement detailing the criteria that will be employed to determine the future operating life for each of the remaining Magnox power stations;

(2) what discussions he has had with National Power about the future policies that will be used to determine the operating plans for the remaining Magnox power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Government are still considering the future arrangements for the Magnox stations and no decisions on the detailed implementation of our policy have been taken. As my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Energy said in his statement to the House on 24 July, we will give the House a full opportunity to debate our detailed proposals when they are available.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list in the Official Report the estimated operating life for each of the remaining Magnox power stations.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The operating lifetime of Magnox stations assumed for planning purposes by the CEGB is 30 years. The actual operating life of each station is a commercial matter for the owner of the station, subject to meeting the requirements of the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate.

Gas-cooled Reactors

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the proposals submitted to his Department detailing the steps to be taken to ensure that each of the advanced gas-cooled reactors can reach its designed level of output.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The achievement of optimum operation of the advanced gas-cooled reactors is a matter for the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland electricity board. I have asked the chairman of the CEGB to write to my hon. Friend.

British Gas (Service Objectives)

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what quality of service objectives have been set for British Gas with regard to priority attention for elderly customers and those with small children requiring work to be done on hot water and heating systems; and to what extent the actual levels of service correspond to those objectives.

Mr. Peter Morrison: These are matters for the Gas Consumers Council and the Director General of Gas Supply to take up with British Gas.

In relation to the elderly and disabled, British Gas has a code of practice on special services, as required by condition 13 of its authorisation.

The recent Gas Consumers Council report, "Review of British Gas Services for Elderly and Disabled Consumers", recommended that elderly and disabled people, particularly those with special heating or hot water requirements, should receive priority attention for emergency repair work.

The Director General of Gas Supply has called on British Gas to implement those recommendations in the GCC report addressed to it and to agree to a change in its authorisation that would give them legal force.

Severn Barrage

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about progress on the Severn barrage studies.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The report summarising the work by the Severn Tidal Power Group on the Severn barrage is being published today by HMSO in the Department's energy paper series. Copies are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament. The £4 million study was jointly funded by the Severn Tidal Power Group, the Central Electricity Generating Board and my Department. I am grateful to them for their contribution to the study and also to the many other participants in the work.

The study gives a clearer picture, than hitherto, on costs and performance of a tidal barrage and on regional and environmental issues. However, much further work, particularly on environmental issues and the organisation and financing issues of a Severn barrage remains to be done. Work to address these issues will be undertaken during the next two years. In the meantime, essential site specific environmental work will continue.

As part of the privatisation and restructuring of the electricity supply industry the Government are setting up arrangements which should be very attractive to suppliers of renewable sources of energy but it will of course be for the industry to determine the financial viability of each project.

The Department will be funding generic tidal R and D in support of site specific work on the Severn, Mersey and other estuaries. This work mainly addresses environmental issues. The total cost of generic environmental studies completed since 1986 and currently under way amounts to £1 million.

Bradwell Power Station

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if the Central Electricity Generating Board has calculated the level of wigner energy in the twin cores at Bradwell nuclear power station; whether there are any plans to anneal the cores before decommissioning; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This is an operational matter for the CEGB. I have, therefore, asked the chairman of the board to reply direct to the hon. Member.

ENVIRONMENT

Environmental Assessments

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance his Department has received from the European Commission concerning the environmental assessment of projects being funded by or the subject of a grant application for European regional development funds; and if he will place copies of such guidance in the Library.

Mr. Moynihan: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) on 17 October at column 111.

Parliamentary Questions

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the categories of information on which he is not prepared to answer parliamentary questions on grounds of (a) commercial confidentiality and (b) national security.

Mr. Chris Patten: It is not possible to specify all the circumstances in which such considerations may arise.

Clean Air Congress

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, 28 July, Official Report, column 1178, on the world clean air congress held in September, he will publish the letter he sent to the hon. Member.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have arranged for a copy of the letter to be placed in the Library. The hon. Member will recall that I was unable to answer his original question before the recess and so replied by letter.

Environmental Protection

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Merionnydd Nant Conwy, 28 July, Official Report, column 1196, he will publish in the Official Report the letter sent in reply relating to environmental protection expenditure.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A copy of the letter has been placed in the Library. The OECD report to which reference was made in the letter is now expected to be released in the new year.

Community Charge

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will introduce legislation so that anonymous personal information cannot be disclosed by a registration officer to another person for purposes not connected with the community charge, if the anonymity of the information cannot be guaranteed by that person.

Mr. David Hunt: The collection, storage and transmission of personal data by registration officers are subject to the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984. No further specific provision is required.

Carnwath Report

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take following the recommendations of the Carnwath report "Enforcing Planning Control", published in February.

Mr. Howard: Our consultations on the report's recommendations have revealed wide support for them. My right hon. Friend is seeking a legislative opportunity to strengthen the enforcement provisions in the Town and Country Planning Act 1971.

Local Authorities (Competitive Tendering)

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any proposals to increase the present limit of £25,000 above which local authority contracts must be put out to tender.

Mr. David Hunt: New Direct Labour Organisation Competition Regulations were laid before Parliament recently whereby, from 1 October this year, local authorities are required to subject all their building maintenance and new construction work to competition with the private sector. From the same date the de minimis exemption for small authorities was reduced from 30 to 15 employees.

The emergency work exemption has been redefined to cover only genuinely unpredictable work with effect from 1 April 1990, the date from which authorities are also prohibited from awarding extension "contracts" for maintenance work to their DLOs.

As regards highways work, the competition-free allowance was reduced significantly from 1 April 1987 and again from 1 April 1988. Any increase in the present threshold of £25,000 above which all local authority highways contracts must be put out to tender would not be desirable as it would reduce the benefits of competition.

Rutland Water (Toxic Algae)

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the progress of the investigation by the National Rivers Authority into the death of dogs and sheep at Rutland Water, following the growth of toxic algae in the water; and whether it is intended (a) to bring prosecutions against Anglian Water under the Water Act 1989 or (b) to recommend the payment of compensation to the owners of the dead animals or of affected businesses.

Mr. Howard: I understand that the National Rivers Authority has been monitoring the sites it had identified as affected, or potentially affected, by toxic blue-green algae, including Rutland Water, and that the incidence is declining. The results of its tests are available on the public registers maintained by the NRA, and have been notified to the land owners, who have been given suggestions as to appropriate precautions. The NRA's investigations into the causes are continuing, though algal blooms are a normal seasonal phenomenon, and it is not thought that these are the result of specific polluting incidents. Any decisions on follow-up action including questions of possible prosecution would be for the NRA.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning the number of local authorities in England and Wales who are making arrangements for community charge payers to pay the charge by means of monthly payments; what is his policy towards encouraging local authorities to accept monthly payments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Every community charge payer has a statutory right to pay the community charge in 10 monthly instalments. There is no need for chargepayers to apply for this facility; and local authorities are statutorily obliged to accept montly instalments of one tenth of the charge. It is open to chargepayers and authorities to agree different arrangements if they wish; but an authority may not specify payments other than by monthly instalments without the agreement of the chargepayer.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution the Government will make towards additional revenue costs of running the poll tax in 1990-91 in Calderdale.

Mr. David Hunt: The costs of collecting the community charge in 1990-91 will be taken into account in charging authorities' spending assessments.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution the Government will make towards the shortfall on capital allocation incurred by Calderdale council in implementing the poll tax.

Mr. David Hunt: We have made allocations of £160 million to charging authorities towards the capital costs associated with implementing the community charge in 1988-89 and 1989-90. Calderdale's allocation was £513,071.

Mr. Bevan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, when he will consult representatives of local government and relevant professional bodies on his determination under part VI of the Local Government and Housing Bill of housing revenue account subsidy for 1990-91; and what proposals he will be making.

Mr. Howard: My Department is today sending local housing authorities, the local authority associations and other interested bodies consultation papers on the proposed new housing revenue account subsidy. The papers contain the Secretary of State's detailed proposals for a method of calculating the new subsidy for which the Local Government and Housing Bill makes provision. They also include details of the guideline rents, and of the allowances for expenditure on management and maintenance which we propose to take into account in calculating each authority's entitlement to subsidy in 1990-91. Comments are invited within six weeks. I am putting a copy of the consultation papers in the Library together with a list of the guidelines proposed for each authority.

For the rent guideline we propose to follow the practice of the past two years and assume next year an average rent increase in England of 5 per cent. above the allowance for inflation. But this year we propose to use the provisions in part VI of the Bill to allow the aggregate notional rental income for England to be apportioned between housing authorities by reference to variations in the aggregate values of houses and other property. This leads to different guideline rents for different authorities. A set of rules to limit changes ensures that no guideline rent would represent an increase of more than £4.50 a week over the average rent in any authority this year, and permits at the lower end of the scale guidelines which assume modest reductions in real rents of up to 9 pence per week. This should begin the process of encouraging authorities towards sensible levels of rents in different parts of the country, while ensuring that rents can remain within the reach of people in low paid employment.

For the management and maintenance expenditure guideline we propose to assume an increase for each housing authority of 3 per cent. above the allowance for inflation next year. This should enable the level of expenditure on council housing maintenance to continue to grow.

The "guidelines" both for rent and for management and maintenance spending are no more than the assumptions the Government will make in calculating subsidy. Each council will have to decide for itself what level of rent it wants to set, and how much it wants to spend on managing or maintaining its stock.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is now taking to ensure that there are changes in the law concerning the importation and movement of toxic waste so as to prevent the recurrence of the experience suffered in the Wath on Dearne area this year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We are considering the implications of the incident at Wath on Dearne and any need for legislative changes.

Acid House Parties

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to remove rating relief from farmers who let out agricultural land for acid house parties.

Mr. Chope: Agricultural land is exempt from rates. Where the land is used for purposes other than that for which it is exempted, it may be brought into rating depending on the degree and frequency of that other use.

Bradwell Power Station

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if there are any plans for the Bradwell nuclear power station site to be used as a national repository for radioactive debris and equipment resulting from the decommissioning of the Magnox programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. Nirex's disposal facility for low and intermediate-level radioactive waste is intended to accommodate both operational and decommissioning wastes. The Government have made it clear that it intends to keep open the sea disposal option for large items arising from decommissioning operations.

Chlorofluorocarbons

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further steps he is taking to encourage and facilitate the recovery of chlorofluorocarbons in refrigerators in (a) the liquid, and (b) the foam; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has commissioned a study from independent consultants on the recovery of substances—including CFCs—which are controlled under the Montreal protocol. The Government will consider the conclusions of this study which are expected early next year.

A number of retail outlets and local authorities have already set up schemes to reclaim CFCs from domestic appliances. ICI has recently announced their intentions to help establish a national network of sites for the collection and recycling of reclaimed CFCs.

Ministerial Correspondence

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of the paper used for ministerial correspondence in his Department consists of (a) mill off-cuts and (b) previously used paper.

Mr. Chris Patten: All the letterheaded paper used for ministerial correspondence in the Department of the Environment is manufactured from mill off-cuts.

Animals (Illegal Trading)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to counter the illegal trade in hawksbill and green turtles; when he last raised the matter with the Japanese Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Infractions of the CITES controls would be matters for the CITES Secretariat. the United Kingdom strictly implements the provisions of the convention on international trade in endangered species of wild fauna and flora (CITES) under which commercial trade in hawksbill and green turtles is already prohibited. We have not raised the matter with the Japanese Government.

Homelessness

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the numbers of homeless persons listed each year from 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The estimated numbers of households for whom English local authorities accepted responsibility to secure accommodation under the homelessness provisions of the Housing Act are as follows:

	Numbers
1979	57,200
1980	62,920
1981	70,010
1982	74,800
1983	78,240
1984	83,550
1985	93,980

	Numbers
1986	103,560
1987	112,440
1988	117,550

However, because of changes in the reporting system in 1980 and 1982 the figures for the earlier years are not strictly comparable with those since 1983.

Sewage Works (Discharges)

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, by region (a) all those sewage works which have been granted applications for relaxations of their discharge consents by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, (b) all those for which applications were refused and (c) the number of objections to proposed relaxations received by his Department for each sewage works.

Mr. Chris Patten: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the applications for time-limited consent which have been submitted in the context of the water industry's capital investment programme for sewage treatment works. No such applications have yet been granted or refused although a number have been withdrawn by the water authorities' successor companies. Temporary consents have been granted pending completion of the process of considering applications and objections to them. Some 10,000 representations have been received as a result of advertising these applications.

Water Privatisation

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish schemes made under schedule 2 to the Water Act with regard to the transfer of property, rights and liabilities to the National Rivers Authority and the water authority successor companies.

Mr. Chris Patten: Copies of all the schemes of transfer except one are now in the House Library. A copy of the remaining scheme will be placed in the Library within a few days.

Wimpey No-fines Properties

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice the Building Research Establishment is able to offer owners and lending institutions on the structural condition of Wimpey no-fines houses and flats.

Mr. Chope: The BRE's report on 'The structural condition of Wimpey no-fines low-rise dwellings" is published today. I commend this report to the House. Its conclusions are reassuring for owners and lending institutions alike.

The BRE inspected a range of houses and flats built in the 1950s and 1960s. They found most properties were constructed as designed, although minor variations in the type and distribution of reinforcement were found.

The BRE considers that these constructional variations do not materially affect the structural adequacy of the dwellings. In the vast majority of cases reinforcement was in a reasonable condition; where corrosion had occurred, its effects on no-fines construction were no greater than would be expected in traditional masonry-walled dwellings.

Indeed, the structural system of Wimpey no-fines low-rise dwellings is essentially the same as that of traditional solid-walled masonry dwellings: such systems are simple and robust and are unlikely to be significantly affected by minor variations in workmanship or isolated cracking in the concrete.

The report also contains much useful information on no-fines construction which should be particularly helpful to lending institutions and their surveyors when considering mortgage applications, and also to local authorities and private owners when approaching the repair and maintenance of these dwellings.

The report will be distributed to all major lending institutions and to interested local authorities.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing, for each local authority in England (a) the party in control, and (b) the budgeted overspend on settlement for 1989-90 expressed in percentage terms.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 17 October 1989]: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Conservative Party Conference 1989

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total cost of the services provided by his Department in connection with security requirements at the 1989 Conservative party conference.

Mr. Chris Patten [holding answer 19 October 1989]: None.

Tyne and Wear Development Corporation

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give his latest information as to how many new jobs in Sunderland have been created by the activities of the Tyne and Wear development corporation from its inception.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 20 October 1989]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier) gave him on 20 July at column 346.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne can expect a reply to his letter of 3 August to the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier) concerning Mr. Richard Hall and Resicon Ltd.

Mr. Chope: I replied to the hon. Member's letter on 20 October.

Theatre Royal, Bradford

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether any application to list the Theatre Royal in Bradford has been submitted over the last ten years; whether any buildings adjacent to the Theatre Royal are listed buildings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend has not received an application to list the Theatre Royal in the last 10 years. However, the building would have been assessed for listing during the resurvey of the area in 1983, following which several buildings in Manningham lane were included on the statutory list, including the Theatre tavern and the Royal Standard public house, which are adjacent to the theatre. My right hon. Friend is always prepared to reconsider a building for listing if fresh evidence is produced which shows that it possesses special architectural or historic interest.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Security Patrols

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will state the number of (a) Royal Ulster Constabulary patrols, (b) Regular Army patrols and (c) Ulster Defence Regiment patrols, as a percentage of the total number of patrols carried out by the security forces for each month since November 1985 and (d) Ulster Defence Regiment patrols which were accompanied by the Royal Ulster Constabulary as a percentage of the total number of patrols conducted by the regiment for each month since November 1985.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 20 October 1989]: Information is not regularly collected in the form requested, and could not be provided except at disproportionate cost.

WALES

Rents into Mortgages Scheme

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he has any information on the number of tenants who may wish to participate in his rents into mortgages scheme;

(2) if he will make a further statement on the operation of his proposed rents into mortgages scheme.

Mr. Grist: The flexi-ownership scheme which I announced in September will be introduced on an experimental basis by the Development Board for Rural Wales. By combining a mortgage loan, discount entitlement and a deferred payment, the board's tenants will be able to buy their homes at a weekly outlay broadly the same as their existing rent payments. Next month I expect to be able to announce the formal start of the scheme. At this stage I cannot anticipate the possible take-up but I am confident that the experiment will have most positive results.

River Pollution

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list those applications under section 31 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 and section 107 of the Water Act 1989, respectively, for consents to discharge to the rivers Taff and Ely which are currently under consideration by Welsh Water authority;

(2) to what extent, in considering whether to issue consents under section 31 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 and section 197 of the Water Act 1989, respectively, to discharge into the rivers Taff and Ely, the Welsh Water authority takes account of down stream build-up of pollutants which will arise when the Cardiff bay development corporation constructs a barrage across the mouth of the two rivers.

Mr. Grist: Schedule 26, part III of the Water Act 1989 provides that all applications made to a water authority under the Control of Pollution Act 1974, which were under consideration on the transfer date of 1 September, are to be considered as if they were made to the National Rivers Authority (NRA). All new applications made under section 108 of the 1989 Act also fall to be considered by the NRA. I therefore suggest that the hon. Gentleman contacts the NRA's regional headquarters in Cardiff.

Departmental Circulars

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action is being taken by his Department to ensure that circulars which are identical or nearly identical with those issued by English Departments of state are issued at the same time as those published by the English Departments of state.

Mr. Peter Walker: Many of the circulars issued by my Department are issued jointly with the relevant Whitehall Department. Where they are separate, however, my Department seeks to issue them concurrently with their English equivalents unless there are good reasons for not doing so. In such cases they are issued as soon as possible.

Water Industry

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to ensure that there is effective, independent and balanced representation of Welsh consumers in the membership of the customer service committees covering the water industry in Wales.

Mr. Grist: Appointments to the customer service committees are a matter for the Director General of Water Services. My Department has on behalf of the director sought nominations in Wales from various interested groups.

Health Service

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many beds there were at West Wales general hospital, Glangwili, Carmarthen, on the 1 January of each year from 1979 to the present time; and what are the projected figures for 1 January 1990.

Mr. Grist: The complement of beds on 31 December each year since 1978 is given in the table. Information on projected beds complement is not available centrally.

	Number
1978	526
1979	526
1980	526
1981	526
1982	526
1983	524
1984	524
1985	513
1986	513
1987	507
1988	515

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales with how many hospital beds the West Wales general hospital, Glangwili, Carmarthen is staffed, in terms of the number of doctors, nurses, laboratory staff and support services.

Mr. Grist: At 31 March 1989 there were 511 available staffed beds at the West Wales general hospital. This figure refers to beds which were either occupied or ready for occupation and therefore may differ from bed complement.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest figures for the number of beds at each of the major hospitals covered by the East Dyfed health authority.

Mr. Grist: The bed complement of hospitals in East Dyfed with 100 beds or more, at 31 March 1989, is shown in the table:

	Number
Bronglais general	272
West Wales general	515
Llanelli general	139
Bryntirion	124
St. David's	404

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest figures for the total number of hospital beds in (a) East Dyfed health authority's catchment area and (b) Wales.

Mr. Grist: At 31 March 1989 the bed complement of hospitals in the East Dyfed health authority area was 1,638. The corresponding figure for Wales was 21,417.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total number of people in the catchment areas served by (a) West Wales general hospital Glangwili, Carmarthern and (b) East Dyfed health authority.

Mr. Grist: The total number of people in the catchment area served by East Dyfed health authority is approximately 220,000. The catchment population for West Wales general hospital is not available centrally.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of private beds in West Wales general hospital, Carmarthen, on 1 January 1979 and on 1 January 1989; and what are the projected figures for 1 January 1990.

Mr. Ian Grist: An authorisation permitting a maximum of three beds in West Wales general hospital, Carmarthen, to be occupied by private patients was in effect on 1 January 1979 and remained in effect on 1 January 1989. On 1 June 1989 a group authorisation came into effect for West Wales general hospital, Carmarthen; Bronglais hospital, Aberystwyth; and Llanelli hospital; this replaced the separate limits at each hospital, totalling seven beds, with an equivalent authorisation for a maximum of 2,555 bed days in one year. Authorisations for individual hospitals in East Dyfed are no longer specified.

I understand that the health authority is considering whether to seek a change to the present group authorisation. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to establish the intentions of the health authoriy in this matter he should write to the chairman.

EC Aid

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what financial compensation has been offered to South Glamorgan county council for the loss of grant from the European regional development fund for major infrastructure projects.

Mr. Peter Walker: None. Negotiations with the European Commission on the eligibility of certain categories of expenditure, including infrastructure investments, for European regional development fund support are continuing.

Cadw

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about future management arrangements for Cadw.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have concluded that Cadw should become a candidate for executive agency status within my Department with effect from April 1991. Detailed proposals will now be drawn up in full consultation with the staff involved.

HEALTH

Animal-related Injuries

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital admissions in 1983 and 1988 resulted from accidents or injuries caused by animals.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is not available centrally.

Children-at-risk Register

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by local authority district the numbers of children on the at-risk register.

Mr. Mellor: This information is published in the "Survey of Children and Young Persons on Child Protection Registers; year ending 31 March 1988, England", copies of which are available in the Library.

NHS Property Sales

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, by year and location for the last 10 years, the number of National Health Service properties that have been sold and then purchased by a private health company.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not available.

Correspondence

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne can expect a reply to his letter of 17 July to the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) concerning matters raised by Mr. Richard Pearn, of 15 Chapel close, Kehelland, Camborne, Cornwall.

Mr. Freeman: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health has now written to my hon. Friend.

Hospitals (Red Alert)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how long Whipps Cross hospital and Wanstead hospital have been on red alert; for what reasons; what are the implications for services to patients; if he will ensure that the alert is lifted before the onset of the winter months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The number of emergency admissions to Whipps Cross hospital increased by up to 35 per cent. from mid-August to early October. To maintain in-patient services for emergency and urgent admissions it was necessary to restrict some planned admissions. To do this Waltham district health authority issued a red warning from 3 October to 16 October 1989. This has led to some patients experiencing delays in their planned admissions.

The health authority has plans to allocate beds flexibly to deal with the increased winter workload. This has been the procedure in the last two years.

Child Minders

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the average time being taken by local authorities social services departments to approve the registration of child-minders.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold centrally information about the time taken to register child-minders.

AIDS

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, following the health circular HC(88)43 reference to ensuring that full use is made of family planning services as a resource in combating AIDS, those health authorities in England who have (a) allocated separate budgets for this work, (b) initiated staff training programmes and (c) plan to review both written and verbal information given to clients about HIV/AIDS.

Mr. Mellor: We do not collect this information centrally.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) for what purposes the Macfarlane trust has made grants to haemophiliacs suffering from AIDS;

(2) how many haemophiliacs have applied for grants from the Macfarlane trust; how many applications have been successful; and how many were refused because their financial resources were considered to be too high;

(3) how much of the £10 million provided by the Government have been distributed by the Macfarlane trust to haemophiliacs who have developed AIDS; and how much money remains.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: It is for the trustees to allocate funds in the way which they consider best meets the needs of those eligible for assistance within the terms of the trust deed.

I understand, however, that in the period up to the 31 August 1989 the trust made 1,600 single payments totalling around £0·9 million and 578 regular payments totalling around £1 million. The single grants have been made for a wide variety of purposes covering needs arising from reasons of physical health and mental stress, general living conditions, mobility and travel, accommodation, employment and education. Regular payments help with the extra cost of living with HIV, principally diet and heating. Should the right hon. Member wish to know more detail I suggest he contact the trust administrator.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will request the Macfarlane trust to consider giving grants for legal fees that have arisen solely because haemophiliacs have become infected with the AIDS virus;

(2) what advice or instructions were given to the Macfarlane trust regarding the imposition and level of means test to be applied to haemophiliac victims of AIDS;

(3) what means test is applied by the Macfarlane trust to haemophiliac sufferers of AIDS; and if he will publish the income and capital limits in the Official Report.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The Macfarlane Trust is an independent charitable trust. It is a matter for the trustees, and not the Department, to determine within the provisions of the trust deed the criteria for allocating funds. A copy of that deed is in the House Library. I understand that the trust considers it inappropriate to help with legal fees incurred by haemophiliacs with HIV who wish to pursue claims for compensation. Those who consider themselves in need of assistance can apply for legal aid in the normal way.

Health in Old Age

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the three component parts of the health in old age programme.

Mr. Freeman: The four component parts of the health in old age programme of the Health Education Authority are:

i. the Centre for Health and Retirement Education;
ii. the Age Well Campaign;
iii. the King's Fund Informal Carers Project; and
iv. the production of a series of leaflets.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department funds any programmes designed to promote better health in later life other than the health in old age programme.

Mr. Freeman: The Department funds a number of voluntary organisations under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968, which in various ways promote the physical and mental well-being of elderly people. Among them is "Extend", an organisation concerned with exercise training and fitness for elderly and disabled people.

We also finance the Keep Warm Keep Well campaign, which is organised jointly by the Government and leading voluntary organisations.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total annual cost of funding each component part of the health in old age programme; and what is the total cost of funding the entire programme.

Mr. Freeman: The total cost of funding the entire health in old age programme in 1989-90 is £342,000. The breakdown of this is: grant to centre for health and retirement education £117,000; support for the King's Fund Informal Carers Project £92,000; funding of the Age Well campaign £83,000; and £50,000 for the production of leaflets. The funding for the Age Well campaign includes £30,000 from the retail price index error funds and is paid direct to Age Well by the Department of Health.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what priority his Department is giving to the promotion of good health in later life.

Mr. Freeman: The Government remain strongly committed to the promotion of good health in later life, and accept the Health Education Authority's view that this commitment will in future be served by ensuring that all their relevant programmes address the health education needs of elderly people.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the Health Education Authority's budget is allocated to funding the health in old age programme.

Mr. Freeman: For 1989-90, just over 2 per cent. (£312,000) of the Health Education Authority's non-AIDS budget is allocated to the health in old age programme. This is additional to the significant contributions to a healthy and active old age made by the authority's other health education programmes.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what representations he has received regarding the future funding of the health in old age programme;

(2) what representations he has received regarding the health in old age programme.

Mr. Freeman: The Department has received a total of 35 representations from organisations and individuals concerned with elderly people in relation to the operation and future funding of the health in old age programme.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure the continued development of the health in old age programme.

Mr. Freeman: In its strategic plan for the next five years, the Health Education Authority (HEA) proposes to take forward the health education needs of the elderly as an integral part of its work on other programmes rather than as a separate programme. This will ensure that the needs of the elderly are taken into account at all stages of development of health education work. We have now approved HEA's strategic plan.

Family Planning

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many women attended (a) their general practitioner and (b) a National Health Service family planning clinic for family planning advice and treatment in England in 1987 and 1988.

Mr. Mellor: The number of women receiving contraceptive services from general medical practitioners in England is estimated at 2,555,000 in 1987 and 2,635,000 in 1988. These figures reflect the position at the end of the calendar year and include women accepted for contraceptive services by a general practitioner other than their own.

In the financial year 1987-88 in England 1,318,800 women were seen at health authority planning clinics. We do not yet have figures for 1988-89.

Child Abuse

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the use of training support programme moneys for multi-disciplinary training in the context of child abuse; to whom such moneys are paid; and what monitoring is taking place to ensure that such moneys are financing training for all relevant disciplines.

Mr. Mellor: Grant is payable to local authorities at the rate of 70 per cent. for agreed expenditure under the training support programme (child care) which is intended primarily for training staff of social services departments. However; local authorities are encouraged to make places available on courses funded under the training support programme to staff from other agencies (statutory or non-statutory). Local authorities may also use this grant to develop the social services department's contribution to the multi-disciplinary training responsibilities of area child protection committees.

Arrangements have been made to monitor the use of the grant by local social services departments. Reports on achievements by social services departments are scheduled for return to the Department of Health after completion of the first year of the programme.

Infertility

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many district health authorities provide dedicated infertility clinics;

(2) if he will list private clinics in each region which offer in vitro fertilisation;

(3) if he will list those private clinics, in each region, which offer artificial insemination by donor or husband;

(4) in which regions an in vitro fertilisation service is provided;

(5) which health authorities (a) provide a service for artificial insemination by donor or by husband and (b) do not.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold this information centrally.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue guidance to district health authorities to establish dedicated infertility clinics.

Mr. Mellor: No. Decisions about the priority and resources to be given to infertility services should be left to individual health authorities. This is the case with nearly all NHS services, since health authorities are in the best position to determine priorities in the light of local needs and circumstances.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he intends to introduce legislation which will require married couples, partners or unmarrid women to go through strict vetting procedures, similar to those carried out prior to adoption, before treatment by artificial insemination;

(2) whether he has any proposals for regulations to cover full and extensive medical examination of would-be donors of sperm for artificial insemination.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The Government's proposals for the regulation of certain infertility treatments, including artificial insemination by donor, were set out in the White Paper "Human Fertilisation and Embryology: A Framework for Legislation". We intend to introduce legislation to deal with these matters at the earliest opportunity.

Embryo Research

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he plans to give the voluntary licensing authority on embryo research a statutory basis.

Mr. Mellor: The Government's proposals for dealing with the issue of embryo research are set out in the White Paper "Human Fertilisation and Embryology: A Framework for Legislation". We intend to bring forward legislation in this area at the earliest opportunity.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which clinics have had their licence from the voluntary licensing authority for embryo research withdrawn or suspended; and what were the reasons given in each case.

Mr. Mellor: None.

Generic Medicines

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of generic medicines dispensed in National Health Service hospitals were (a) manufactured in the United Kingdom, (b) manufactured within the European Community and (c) manufactured outside the European Community, in respect of each of the years from 1980 onwards.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold this information centrally.

Spectacles

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proportion of spectacle frames were imported in 1979 and each succeeding year;

(2) what proportion of spectacle lenses were imported in 1979 and each succeeding year.

Mr. Freeman: Information is not available in the precise form requested. However, the value of imports of spectacle glass and frames in the period from 1979 to 1988 —the latest year for which figures are available—is shown in the table.

	£ million
1979	29·0
1980	29·0
1981	26·6
1982	36·6
1983	37·8
1984	47·4
1985	61·1
1986	63·2
1987	76·8
1988	81·9

Warrington DHA

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the spending per head of the population served by Warrington district health authority in the latest available year; and, what is the figure per head, on the most nearly comparable basis for (a) England and (b) the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 28 July 1989]: Figures for spending per head of resident population for 1987-88 (the latest year available) are shown in the table:

Revenue expenditure per head of resident population—hospital and community health services (HCHS)[1]

Warrington district health authority	265
England—average for all district health authorities	227
United Kingdom	238

[1] Includes hospital, community health, patient transport (i.e. ambulance), blood transfusion and other services.

Sources

(a) 1987-88 annual accounts of district health authorities in England and those of the analogous health authorities, boards and agencies in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland—as submitted to the central health department in each country.

(b) Mid-year estimates of populations—1987 (Office of Population Censuses and Surveys)

Notes to the table

1. Capital expenditure on HCHS is excluded. Expenditure on family practitioner services (which cannot be strictly attributed to particular districts) and expenditure on personal social services (which in Northern Ireland is accounted for by health and social services boards) is also excluded.

2. Comparisons between the figures are influenced by a number of factors including:—

(a) people travel across district boundaries for treatment and resource allocations reflect the pattern of service provision locally;

(b) the population figures used make no allowance for people resident in one district who receive treatment in another or for differences in morbidity and age sex structure of particular populations.

Foetal Tissue

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangement he has made for consultations on the recommendations of the Polkinghorne committee on foetal tissue.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The committee reported in July and its main recommendations were accepted by the Government. Given the speed of recent developments in the field we decided to promulgate its new code of practice on the use of foetal tissue for research and treatment without delay. We are now taking forward the committee's other recommendations.

Grading Appeals (Trent RHA)

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many grading appeals have so far been considered by the Trent regional health authority; how many remain to be heard; and what is his estimate of the date by which the hearing of those appeals will be completed.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Requests for regional appeals are handled by the regional appeals committee secretariat of the general Whitley council in accordance with an agreement of the general Whitley council. I presume the hon. Member is referring to appeals about nurse clinical grading. I understand that to date 346 appeals for hearing by the Trent regional health authority have been lodged with the secretariat. As soon as full statements of case are to hand, hearings can be arranged by the regional health authority. I understand that no cases are yet ready for hearing. I can offer no estimate of how long it will take for any particular regional appeal to be heard, but I know that regional health authorities will make every effort to operate the appeals process as quickly as they are able.

Nurses (Grading Appeals)

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has considered the effect of the changes in the composition of health authorities in regard to the hearing of appeals against decisions in regard to the grading of nurses.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: NHS appeals procedures are a matter for the general Whitley council which of course keeps under review the need for any change.

Rotherham Health Authority

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the accuracy of the performance indicators issued by his Department earlier in 1989; and if those which purported to reveal the Rotherham health authority in an unsatisfactory light were accurate.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: In 1987-88 all information systems in England were substantially changed and many new data definitions introduced in accordance with the recommendations of the Körner reports. Health service indicators being published this year are the first to be based on data from the redesigned systems. The Department and health authorities were aware that with changes of this magnitude some data inaccuracies were likely. Following consultation with health authorities in May a subset of the 1987-88 indicators were published in July with a warning about possible inaccuracies. Health authorities were asked to inform the Department of any inaccuracies found so that the full package could be based on more accurate data. Relatively few amendments proved necessary. Rotherham HA drew attention to problems with part of its data and the indicators based on this are being corrected.

Wathwood Hospital

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has of the savings effected by the closure of beds at Wathwood hospital by the Rotherham health authority in relation to the cost to public funds of placements in private nursing homes; and if he will encourage the authority to retain those beds.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The proposed closure at Wathwood hospital is a matter for Rotherham health authority and I suggest the hon. Member contacts the chairman of the health authority for the information he seeks.

Consultants

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has conducted to establish whether the number of operations performed by a consultant in the National Health Service is related to that consultant's involvement in private practice.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: None.

Erythropoietin

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether there is any restriction on the freedom of doctors to prescribe erythropoietin for patients with kidney failure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what action he intends to take to make erythropoietin freely available under the National Health Service;

(2) what is the estimated cost to the National Health Service of providing erythropoietin to those likely to benefit from it.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Erythropoietin has not yet been granted a product licence. However, it is open to doctors to prescribe the medicine on a named patient basis.

We have been in touch with health authorities about the likely need for the drug and its expenditure implications. We are assessing the information to determine the best way forward.

Cornwall and Isles of Scilly Health Authority

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he is proposing any change to the boundary of the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly health district; and if under the terms of the White Paper "Working for Patients" he identifies the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly health authority as the sole body responsible for identifying the health care needs of all the residents of Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly and for seeking to procure services to meet those needs.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: There are no plans to change the boundaries of the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly health authority district. The answer to the second part of the question is yes, though large GP practices will be able to seek their own budgets which will cover a defined range of hospital treatments.

NHS Reorganisation

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what specific Acts of Parliament and statutory instruments will be required to implement the changes in the National Health Service presently planned by the Government.

Mr. Mellor: [holding answer 19 October 1989]: We intend to introduce a Bill at the earliest opportunity to give effect to those of our proposals which require primary legislation. The Bill will be supplemented by statutory instruments as necessary.

GP Computer Software

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the user specification for general practitioner computer programme software will be available that will enable general practitioners to provide the information required by the National Health Service authorities.

Mr. Mellor: [holding answer 19 October 1989]: If my hon. Friend has in mind general practitioners' annual reports, it will be left to individual practitioners to decide how best to collect the required information.

Medicine Committees

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his practice to appoint to the Medicines Commission and the Committee on Safety of Medicines members without any financial interests in drug companies.

Mr. Mellor: [holding answer 19 October 1989]: No. Members are appointed for the expert advice they are able to give. Any involvements they may have in research sponsored by the pharmaceutical industry helps them keep in touch with important aspects of drug development. By following the ethical standards set by the code of practice on declaration of interests members are able to avoid conflicts of interest which might otherwise impair the objectivity of the advice they give.

Haemophiliacs

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received in regard to settling out of court the claims of haemophiliacs who have been contaminated with the HIV virus by the injection of blood products supplied under the National Health Service; what replies have been sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: We have received 19 representations from Members on the subject of compensation for people with haemophilia and HIV infection and two from the Haemophilia Society. To date seven replies have been issued to Members and one to the Haemophilia Society. The others will be replied to shortly.

GP Referrals

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what current regulatory or administrative constraints prevent general practitioners contracted to the National Health Service from referring a patient to any unit of that service; and what constraints will be, or are likely to be, placed on such general practitioners not opting for budgeted practice status, after implementation of the proposals described by Cm. 555 "Working for Patients", and related consultation papers and statements.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: In principle, GPs currently are free to refer their patients to any unit in the National Health Service, the decision whether or not to accept a referral being a matter for the clinical judgment of the consultant. However, the choices open to GPs may be constrained in practice, for example if the preferred hospital is a victim of its own success and cannot accept additional patients because of budgetary constraints. Our proposals to enable money to follow patients are designed to overcome such problems. The future arrangements for securing GPs rights of referral are described in paragraphs 3.5–3.16 of the recently issued "Contracts for Health Services: Operational principles" copies of which are in the Library.

Consultancy Service Register

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people annually contest their inclusion on his Department's consultancy service register; and whether the outcome of contested cases is made publicly available;

(2) how many persons have information held on them by his Department's consultancy service register;

(3) if there is an appeal procedure to contest being placed on his Department's consultancy service register;

(4) what is the set of criteria for inclusion on his Department's consultancy service register referred to in his Department's circular LAC88/(19) annex A paragraph 8.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The Department's consultancy service is intended to ensure that prospective employers take up appropriate references from previous employers who may hold relevant information about an applicant for a post working with children. Some 6,000 names are currently held on the register. Information held by the Department which led to a person's entry on the register is not generally made available to a prospective employer.

Decisions to place a name on the register are taken jointly by the Department and the social services inspectorate, based on an assessment of whether a person's known past conduct is likely to injure the welfare of any child entrusted to his future care, or to lead to criminal or other harmful behaviour. Past conduct involving violence, sexual offences, supplying drugs or harming children is particularly likely to indicate inclusion.

Once it is decided to place a person on the register he or she is informed in writing of the information held by the Department and the purpose of the registration. He or she is also given the opportunity to challenge the accuracy of the information and to make representations as to why his or her name should not continue to be placed on the register.

No more than six people a year appeal against inclusion on the register. Each such case is carefully considered in the light of the further information provided and the final decision, and the reasons for it, conveyed to the person. The outcome of contested cases is not made public as this is a confidential matter between the Department and the person concerned.

Nurses

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many conversion to first-level nursing places are currently on offer to enrolled nurses throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: We do not hold this information centrally. Information supplied by the English National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting shows that in England the number of schools of nursing approved to conduct conversion courses have increased from six at 31 March 1986 to 145 at 31 March 1989.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Primary Schoolchildren

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list by local education authority the number of primary school-children who were being sent home due to lack of teaching staff at the end of September.

Mr. Alan Howarth: This information is not available.

Open University

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the report of the Open university visiting committee in the context of (a) the development of new courses, (b) current course maintenance and updating and (c) research, as referred to in his answer of 23 May 1988, Official Report, column 11.

Mr. Jackson: The Open university visiting committee reports to my right hon. Friend annually in the autumn. Following its report last year, the Government agreed to provide £12·9 million in additional grant to the university over the three financial years 1989-90 to 1991-92. As a result, the university has been able to avoid making many of the cutbacks in provision which it had earlier feared it would have to make. The visiting committee's report for this year is now being finalised and my right hon. Friend expects to receive it shortly.

UN Data Systems

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what access to the United Nations global resource information database and the United Nations global environmental monitoring system is afforded to United Kingdom research institutes, universities, polytechnics and colleges; and if he will make a statement on the utility of these United Nations data systems for developing environmental education in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jackson: I understand that United Kingdom researchers are able to gain access to data from the global resource information database through a local centre of the global environment monitoring system. This is situated at the monitoring and assessment research centre in the university of London, King's College. The databases are of considerable sophistication and would hence be inappropriate for general use in environmental education at school level.

Environmental Research

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he received the Advisory Board for the Research Councils' latest document on spending advice for 1990 and beyond; what has been his response to proposals to increase environmental research commitment; and what information he has on the environmental research commitment in (a) other Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development states and (b) other EEC member states:

Mr. Jackson: The ABRC's advice "Science and Public Expenditure 1989" was submitted to my right hon. Friend on 12 May. That advice included proposals for environmental research expenditure which have been fully taken into account during the course of the public expenditure survey discussions. I cannot anticipate the outcome of those discussions.

Very little information is available on the environmental research commitment of other countries. The OECD data bank of April 1988 gave the percentage distribution of Government direct appropriations to civil R & D in respect of the environment in 1987 or nearest year as follows:

	Percentage
Portugal	17·9
Australia	15·4
Spain	13·5
Greece	12·8
Canada	12·6
Finland	11·3
Germany	9·3
United Kingdom	8·0
Norway	7·1
Belgium	6·9
Netherlands	6·8
EEC	6·7
Sweden	5·3
United States	4·8
Switzerland	4·7
Denmark	4·2
Italy	3·9
France	3·4
Austria	2·7
Iceland	2·4
Ireland	2·0

Education Records (Access)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will introduce regulations to allow young students access to their own education records modelled on regulations issued under the Access to Personal Files Act; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend plans shortly to issue a consultation paper on access to records of students in further and higher education.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science why his regulations which allow young students access to their own education record prohibit parents access to that record if the student was under 18 years of age, where the record constitutes personal data; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Education (School Records) Regulations 1989 govern the keeping, disclosure and transfer of manual records on their pupils kept by maintained schools and non-maintained special schools. The regulations require that, from 1 September 1990, such records should be disclosed on request to parents of pupils aged under 18, and to pupils aged 16 or over. Certain categories of material, including those whose disclosure might cause serious harm to the pupil or any other person, are exempted from the disclosure requirement.

Local Authority Service

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he intends to take with regard to the criticisms in the Audit Commission's report on advisers and inspectors working within the local authority service, of the service as being poorly managed and with unsystematic record-keeping.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend and I are considering our response to the Audit Commission's report on local education authority inspection and advisory services. We shall wish to take account of the views which the local authority associations express on behalf of LEAs, at whom the report's recommendations are mainly addressed.

Plymouth Brethren

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from members of the Plymouth Brethren concerning the rights of parents to withdraw their children from school classes under the provisions of article 2 of the first protocol to the European convention on human rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: I have received many representations from members of the Brethren that they should have a right to withdraw their children from elements of the secular curriculum in maintained schools to which they have religious objections. Article 2 of the first protocol to the European convention on human rights does not give parents this right. My right hon. Friend and I have decided, as a matter of policy, that we will not allow any group of parents the right to withdraw their children from the secular curriculum in maintained schools on grounds of religion or conscience. But they remain free to make alternative educational arrangements.

School Bus Seats

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will consider reducing the age at which three children are allowed to sit on a double school bus seat, from under 14 to nine years, to take account of the three-tier education system.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The 1984 Public Service Vehicle (Carrying Capacity) Regulations are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. We are at present reviewing this aspect of the regulations, and will write to my hon. Friend when that review is complete.

Teacher Morale

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he received in the summer recess on the morale of the teaching profession while teachers introduce the national curriculum and other reforms; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: We have received correspondence from teachers expressing support for the national curriculum but anxiety at the scale of the reforms facing them. We recognise that our reforms are a challenge to teachers. We value their hard work and commitment, and believe that they will rise to the challenge. In recognition of the demands already facing teachers, my right hon. Friend has decided to defer for the time being any requirement that all teachers should undergo appraisal.

Teacher Shortages

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the effect of the campaign to recruit teachers to solve subject and geographic shortages.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Our action programme to combat teacher shortages was launched in 1986 at a cost so far of £50 million. Recruitment to initial teacher training in physics, maths and CDT was above the 1986 level in both 1987 and 1988. We shall continue to develop and intensify the programme further to improve teacher recruitment in the secondary shortage subjects.

The £2 million education support grant scheme, announced last May, will help LEA's to develop local recruitment schemes to attract qualified teacher returners and mature entrants. Support will be concentrated to assist shortages both by locality and by subject.

Teachers' Pay

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had recently in response to his announcement on teachers' pay made during the parliamentary recess; and if he will make a statement about the future of the machinery for determining teachers' pay.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations about various aspects of the announcement from the teacher unions and individuals. He expects to meet the teacher unions and employers shortly for further discussions about new pay determination arrangements.

National Curriculum

Sir Charles Morrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what resources are listed in the national curriculum for geography in relation to population.

Mrs. Rumbold: The national curriculum will not specify the use of particular resources in relation to any subject or topic. This is a matter for decision by schools and teachers.

The attainment targets and programmes of study for geography in the national curriculum are under consideration by a working group whose interim report is due to be submitted to my right hon. Friend by 31 October. I will arrange for a copy to be sent to my hon. Friend as soon as it is published.

Local Management Schemes

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many local education authorities have failed to provide training for school governors in connection with local management schemes.

Mrs. Rumbold: All authorities have been required to include in their schemes of local management details of their proposals for training governors. It is clear from these schemes and from our monitoring of the education support grant programme for school governor training that training in local management of schools occupies a high priority in authorities' plans.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to ensure that local education authorities provide training for school governors in connection with local management schemes.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave on 27 June 1989, Official Report, col. 410.

Fire Safety, Schools

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he has taken or proposes to take to establish the effectiveness of fire safety arrangements in schools.

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ensure the safety of occupants of schools in the event of fire, the statutory provisions, and guidance regularly issued in support of them, emphasise the importance of maintaining adequate means of escape. The day to day responsibility for properly maintaining safety rests locally, but the Department issues guidance such as Building Bulletin 7 "Fire and the Design of Education Buildings" and "Safety in Education" Bulletin No. 5.

Dyslexia

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many dyslexic children there were in the school population in each of the past seven years; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what guidelines his Department has issued to local education authorities concerning the testing for dyslexia amongst young schoolchildren; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what recent consultations have been carried out between officials of his Department and local education authorities concerning the detection of dyslexia amongst schoolchildren; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Department does not maintain data on individual learning difficulties. The Education Act 1981 requires local education authorities to make an assessment of children in their area with special educational needs which require, or may require, the LEA to determine the appropriate provision. General advice to LEAs on their duties under the Education Act 1981 in relation to the making of assessments and statements of special educational needs is contained in Circular No. 22/89, which was issued on 29 September. I have made arrangements for the hon. Member to receive a copy of this circular, copies of which have already been placed in the Library.

Child Care

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the resource implications of allowing children to remain in school out of school hours in order to allow more women to return to work.

Mrs. Rumbold: None for schools' budgets. The Department's recent letter on this subject to local education authorities and schools specifies that school-based child care schemes must be provided on at least a full cost recovery basis as far as the school is concerned. This is because, under local management of schools, school budgets may not be used to subsidise non-school activities.

Institute of Food Research

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what approaches have been made to the Institute of Food Research, Bristol from any quarter outside the United Kingdom concerning financial support for its activities as an alternative to Her Majesty's Government's current plans for its closure.

Mr. Jackson: There have been no such approaches.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EC Documents

64. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he has completed his review of the consideration by Parliament of European Economic Community documents; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Correspondence resulting from my predecessor's discussions with the Chairman of the Select Committee on European Legislation was published in the first special report from that Committee, Session 1988-89 (HC 533).

I will consider what further measures may be necessary when the Procedure Committee's recommendations are reported to the House.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Clergy Ordination Measure

56. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, (Mr. Alison), as representing the Church Commissioners, what representations the Church Commissioners have received following the debate in the House of the Clergy Ordination Measure.

Mr. Alison: None, Sir. The Clergy Ordination Measure is a matter for the General Synod. As a member of that body I have personally received a number of letters expressing views both of regret and approval at the outcome of the debate of the Measure on 17 July.

EMPLOYMENT

Jobstart

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give details of the evaluation survey of the jobstart programme currently undertaken.

Mr. Eggar: The evaluation of jobstart involves surveys of individuals who have received the allowance and of employers who have engaged such people. A copy of the report on the individuals' survey is in the Library of the House. The report on the employer survey will be available early next year.

Training

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for employment if he will list the names of those employment training managers that have been given approved status as a training organisation.

Mr. Nicholls: No employment training managers have been given approved status as training organisations. All training managers are currently working towards full approved status and have until September 1990 to achieve it.

Employment Service

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many staff were employed by the employment service for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Eggar: The numbers of permanent staff employed by the employment service on the stated date of each of the last 10 years is as follows:

	Numbers
1 January 1980	*31,500
1981	*33,000
1982	*39,000
1983	*38,500
1984	*38,000
1985	*35,500
1986	*36,000
1987	*41,500
1 April 1988	38,801
1989	35,358

In addition, the employment service employed 376 and 1,175 casual staff at 1 April 1988 and 1 April 1989 respectively.

The starred figures are approximations which are roughly comparable to the permanent staff figures for 1988 and 1989—as the employment service did not exist before October 1987, it was necessary to construct them from staff returns for the various parts of the group which eventually formed or contributed to the formation of the employment service.

Adjudication Officers (Decisions)

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by standard Great Britain region, including Greater London, what is the current average length of time between an unemployed claimant receiving an adjudication officer's decision on grounds of restricted availability and non-availability for work and a subsequent appeal.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is not collected and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by standard Great Britain region, including Greater London, what is the current average length of time between a claimant's referral for adjudication and an adjudication officer's decision on grounds of restricted availability and non-availability for work.

Mr. Eggar: Information is not available in the precise form requested. However, the speed with which adjudication officers make decisions (that is, the time between their receiving a referral and reaching a decision) is monitored in a 5 per cent. sample of cases. The sample shows that for the three-month period ending 30 June 1989, the percentage of restricted availability questions decided within four weeks of referral to an adjudication officer, for each employment service region, was as follows:

	Availability per cent.	Restricted availability per cent.
Southern	77·5	70·2
Eastern	92·3	91·7
Western	68·0	76·1
Yorkshire and Humberside	91·0	95·1
South West	65·9	77·6
Northern	100·0	96·6
North West	89·4	83·4
East Midlands	86·3	89·0
West Midlands	93·1	93·1
Wales	96·5	98·2
Scotland	84·9	90·5

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish of 28 July, Official Report, column 1044, what is the average duration of appropriate training, in weeks, given to area directors who do not possess formal professional management qualifications, in order to ensure that they have the management skills necessary to perform their duties.

Mr. Nicholls: The amount of training undertaken by area directors employed by the Health and Safety Executive in order to ensure that they have the management skills necessary to perform their duties varies considerably depending upon their individual needs and experience. The average duration of such training, received over a period of time, is approximately six weeks.

Executive Officers (Promotion Board)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment why no executive officer promotion board is to be held for the north-west region Department of Employment in 1990.

Mr. Eggar: The numbers of staff in the grade, and on the current promotion waiting list, are expected to meet the needs of the Employment Department Group in the north-west region for the coming year.

Mr. V. M. B. Watkins, Redruth

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne can expect a reply to his letter of 25 August to the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), on behalf of Mr. V. M. B. Watkins, of Elcon Western (Electrical) Ltd., Trewirgie Road, Redruth, Cornwall.

Mr. Nicholls: I wrote to the hon. Member on 18 October.

Mrs. Nisbet, Redruth

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne can expect a reply to his letter to the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) dated 3 August, concerning Mrs. Nisbet of 2 Sparnon Hill, Redruth, Cornwall.

Mr. Nicholls: I wrote to the hon. Member on 18 October.

Trade Union Rights

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about the needs for a statutory system to establish a trade union's right to represent its members in negotiations with an employer, and what has been his response.

Mr. Nicholls: I recently received a letter on this matter from the general secretary of the Banking, Insurance and Finance Union. My reply made clear the Government's view that it is for the individual employer to decide whether, and in what cirumstances, to recognise a trade union for collective bargaining purposes. Experience with the statutory recognition procedures contained in the Employment Protection Act 1975 and repealed by the Employment Act 1980 showed them to be highly unsatisfactory in practice.

Training Schemes

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if, in order to reduce the costs incurred by trainees participating in those schemes, he will permit managers of employment training schemes to operate their courses on the basis of four rather than five days per week.

Mr. Nicholls: No. Employment training is designed to be a full-time programme, offering training for a minimum of 30 hours per week over five days.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many filled employment training places there are in the Greater Manchester area; and what percentage this represents of the original departmental projections.

Mr. Nicholls: On 13 October 1989, the latest date for which information is available, there were 9,456 people on employment training in Greater Manchester. Departmental projections are for internal management purposes only.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to increase the allowance offered to employers under employment training.

Mr. Nicholls: Employers are involved in employment training because they recognise the value of quality training. They do not receive allowances for taking part in the programme.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to review the progress of employment training.

Mr. Nicholls: The progress of employment training, like that of all other programmes run by my Department, is kept under constant review.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on what date the Wath Recycling Company was ordered or requested securely to contain toxic waste received from the United States of America; on what date the containment operation commenced; and on what date it was implemented.

Mr. Nicholls: On 10 August 1989 the Health and Safety Executive served a deferred prohibition notice on Wath Recycling Limited prohibiting after 23 August 1989 the loose bulk storage of the toxic waste received from the United States of America. The commencement date of the prohibition was subsequently extended to 10 October 1989. The operation to pack the waste into drums commenced on 14 September and was completed on 8 October.

Dyslexia

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many sufferers of dyslexia were assessed as registered disabled persons and had their names entered in the registered disabled persons' register in each of the past seven years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I regret that this information is available only at disproportionate cost. People who suffer from dyslexia are eligible to register as disabled under the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944. They are also eligible to receive help from the special schemes and services provided for people with disabilities by the employment service and the Training Agency.

Construction Industry Training Boards

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he will now make a decision on the future of the construction industry training boards.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 20 July 1989. Consultations with the board and organisations representing employers have now been completed. My right hon. Friend hopes to be in a position to make an announcement shortly.

Social Fund

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will seek to ensure that the share of moneys received from the European social fund by local authorities is measured and distributed in accordance with real need.

Mr. Eggar: The British Government's aim is to secure the maximum support from the European social fund for the national plans and operational programmes which it has submitted. The distribution of European social fund moneys will be governed by the priorities decided upon by the European Commission in its Community support framework.

Footwear and Leather Industries

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been employed in the footwear and leather industries in the following years (a) 1960, (b) 1965, (c) 1970, (d) 1975, (e) 1980 and (f) each year since 1980 to the present date.

Mr. Nicholls: The Department's statistics on employees in employment are arranged according to the standard industrial classification 1980 and a consistent series is available only from June 1971. Figures prior to that date are classified according to the standard industrial classification 1968. The available information (unadjusted for seasonal variations) is as follows:

YTS

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the total income of an 18 or 19-year-old on the basic level of income support, who is a trainee on employment training and a person of the same age and domestic circumstances, who is a trainee on YTS.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 27 July 1989]: People on Employment Training (ET) receive a training allowance based on the benefits they would receive if they were unemployed plus a training premium of £10 a week. The basic income support for an 18 to 19-year-old is £27·40, which would give a training allowance of £37·40. Non-employed YTS trainees of similar age and circumstances on two year YTS receive minimum training allowances of £29·50 per week in the first year and £35 per week in the second year. Those eligible for one year YTS courses receive a minimum training allowance of £29·50 for the first 13 weeks and £35 per week thereafter. Employed YTS trainees receive a wage equivalent at least to the appropriate level of YTS training allowances. Both ET and non-employed YTS trainees also receive assistance with training-related travel and lodging costs where appropriate.

SCOTLAND

Civil Legal Aid

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the average time taken to process civil legal aid applications in Scotland, in each of the past 10 years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information has not been recorded in the past, but time taken to determine applications is one of the performance measures being implemented by the Scottish Legal Aid Board.

Construction Industry

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his assessment of the prospects for the Scottish construction industry over the coming year.

Mr. Lang: Prospects for the Scottish construction industry over the coming year are very good with orders and output for the first half of 1989 at the highest levels since 1978 and 1980, respectively. Orders in the first half of 1989 were up 26·6 per cent. in real terms on those of the same period for 1988, with the private sector performing particularly well. Increased orders point to continued strong growth of output in the coming year, particularly in the private sector.

This favourable picture is supported by the latest business surveys, ie. the Scottish chambers business survey and the civil engineers workload trends survey. These reveal high levels of optimism regarding the general business situation and future levels of employment during the coming year within the construction industry.

Lithotriptor Centre

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the waiting list, by health board, for access to treatment at the Scottish lithotriptor centre.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of patients awaiting treatment at the Scottish lithotriptor centre on 16 October 1989 was 217. This figure includes five patients from north of England health authorities. The breakdown, by health boards, of the remaining 212 patients is:

	Number
Lothian	47
Greater Glasgow	52
Fife	19
Forth Valley	10

	Number
Tayside	10
Lanarkshire	25

Milk

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland why the sale of unpasteurised milk is not permitted in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The retail sale of unpasteurised milk has been banned in Scotland since the introduction in 1983 of compulsory pasteurisation. This was in response to widespread public concern about the safety of untreated milk following a number of serious outbreaks of milk-borne disease in Scotland (3,500 cases in 12 years including 12 deaths). There are no proposals to relax the ban, which has resulted in the virtual eradication of milk-borne disease in Scotland.

Dyslexia

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many dyslexic children there were in the school population in each of the past seven years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: Information on dyslexic children is not held centrally.

Hospitals (Opting Out)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the names of those hospitals and medical units that have expressed an interest in opting out.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: To date, the Scottish Home and Health Department has been notified of two expressions of interest in possible self-governing status relating to a group of hospitals in Forfar and the Royal Scottish National hospital in Larbert. Self-governing trusts will remain an integral part of the National Health Service and they will not be "opting out" of the National Health Service.

General Practitioners' Contract

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be in a position to announce final plans to safeguard rural practices from changes arising from the new general practitioners' contract.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The 1990 contract for general medical practitioners, issued in August 1989, makes it clear that practices serving sparsely populated areas will continue to be eligible for the inducement practice scheme through which income can be enhanced and that the Scottish rural practice fund, which is kept under continuous review, is considered to be currently well targeted. It is the task of the review body on doctors' and dentists' remuneration to advise the Government on the level of remuneration due to general practitioners and it is not possible at this stage to say what view the review body will take.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to publish regulations establishing a new contract for general practitioners in Scotland as has happened for England and Wales.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Scottish regulations will be laid before Parliament on Wednesday 1 November 1989.

Auction Marts

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report those auction marts which have MLC grading facilities.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is as follows:

National Parks

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to receive the report and recommendations of the Countryside Commission on national parks; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I expect the Countryside Commission for Scotland to produce a report on its review of the management of popular mountain areas early next year.

The issue under review is a complex one and a full statement must await consideration of the commission's report.

Housing Finance

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a supplementary housing capital allocation to East Lothian district council for the current year following the Parliamentary Under-Secretary's comments on 16 June about his Department's overestimate of capital receipts and the impact of the negative capital allocation; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The estimate of capital receipts in 1989-90 was prepared earlier this year with the agreement of the district council. I am aware of the representations made by the council about a supplementary allocation in the light of more recent information. I am not yet in a position to make an announcement about supplementary allocations but hope to do so shortly.

Roads

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are his preferred routes for the proposed A1 dual carriageway at Gladsmuir, Haddington, East Linton and Dunbar; and what procedures will be adopted for public consultation about these proposals.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Our proposals for dualling the A1 as far as Haddington and, in the longer term, to Dunbar form part of strategic proposals on which we are currently consulting widely. Once these consultations are complete and decisions taken, detailed proposals will be prepared for individual schemes. These proposals will be made public in the usual way in accordance with the statutory procedures supplemented where appropriate by local public exhibitions.

Police (Rent Allowance)

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to make a decision about the Police Arbitration Tribunal's newly proposed system to calculate rent allowance for Scottish police officers; what representations he has received regarding the apparent delay; and what steps he intends to take.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The decision of the Police Arbitration Tribunal on rent allowance is still under consideration by the Police Negotiating Board. However, following an agreement reached by the board last April, my right hon. and learned Friend has now advised the chairman of the board of his intention to bring forward regulations as soon as possible to make provision for interim payments to Scottish officers. The regulations, which will be backdated to 1 April 1989, will have the effect of restoring to those officers whose circumstances have not changed since 31 March 1989 the level of rent allowance (including the rates element) which they were receiving at that date.

Contraception

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many general practitioners were at 1 October 1987 and 1988 in contract with health boards to provide contraceptive services to their patients.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of general practitioners in contract with health boards to provide contraceptive services to their patients was 3,273 on 1 October 1987 and 3,328 on 1 October 1988.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients were registered with general practitioners for National Health Service contraception services for 1987 and 1988 in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of women registered with general practitioners for National Health Service contraception services was 272,598 for 1987 and 276,232 for 1988.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of family planning clinics and family planning clinic sessions in each health board in Scotland for the years 1987 and 1988.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is as follows:

Roads

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to provide specific details about the provision of adequate public funds for the road programme announced last May.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As the Secretary of State made clear in his announcement in May, detailed decisions about funding levels for the roads programme will be taken in the course of annual reviews of public expenditure. The current year's review is now in progress and I expect that, as is usual practice, the Secretary of State will announce his public expenditure plans for the three years 1990-91 to 1991-92 towards the end of this calendar year.

Children's Panels

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will consider amendments to the Social Work Scotland Act 1968 to make statutory provision for educational resources to be made available to children's panels disposing of references to children's hearings as well as existing social work facilities and professional expertise; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Social work authorities are responsible under the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 for implementing compulsory measures of care decided by children's hearings, and I strongly encourage those authorities to co-operate with statutory and voluntary organisations in those cases where the latter have a positive contributon to make. I have no plans to amend social work legislation to oblige other services to provide resources.

New Towns

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received for the clarification of his proposals for private new towns companies contained in his White Paper, "Scottish New Towns, The Way Ahead"; and what reply he has had.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 19 October 1989]: A number of inquiries from both the public and the private sector have been made to the Scottish Office for the purpose of clarifying in detail the White Paper proposals. My officials have met with a number of people who have expressed an interest in participating in some way in the setting up of private sector local development companies within the Scottish new towns. These discussions are yet at an early stage and are being treated as confidential.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Community Care

5. Mr. Bright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average amount awarded for non-repayable community care grants in the first year of the social fund.

Mr. Scott: A total of 153,000 community care grants averaging £271 were paid in 1988-89.

26. Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what transfer of social security funds he anticipates making to social services authorities in the light of the recent statement on community care.

Mr. Scott: As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health explained in his statement on 12 July, the Government propose to transfer to local authorities the resources which would otherwise have been provided to finance care through social security payments to people in residential care and nursing homes. The precise amount of the transfer will not be settled until next year.

Claimants

11. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what he is doing to speed up the service for social security claimants.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We are building on the success of the 1988 social security reforms which have made the scheme easier for the public to understand and simpler for staff to operate. As a result in 1989-90 there has been a 20 per cent. improvement in the average time taken to process income support claims compared with 1987-88 and a 24 per cent. reduction in the average time income support and social fund callers spend in our offices.

I am aware, however, that there is still room for further improvement particularly in certain inner cities. We are tackling this by relocating some work, which requires no face-to-face contact, away from London to areas where we have fewer problems over staff recruitment and retention. In addition between now and 1991, we expect our programme to computerise social security operations in all local offices to make a major impact on the speed and accuracy of the service they provide.

Work Seekers

16. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on what help is available to those moving from their home area to seek work.

Mr. Scott: An unemployed person who moves home can immediately claim housing benefit to help with rent and rates payment or income support to help with mortgage interest payments. Also the travel to interview scheme operated by the employment service gives financial assistance to unemployed job seekers attending job interviews away from home.

Community Charge Rebate

18. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people will be eligible for community charge rebate.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Community charge benefit is significantly more generous than rate rebates and will go to an estimated 1 million extra people. Our most recent estimate is that 1 in 4 of those liable to the community charge will receive community charge benefit. The numbers will of course be affected by the community charge transitional relief scheme but no estimates are yet available.

Social Fund

19. Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what evidence he has of the way in which social fund officers are meeting individual need.

Mr. Scott: Social fund officers have met the individual needs of more than 1·5 million people since April 1988 by the payment of interest-free loans and non-repayable community care grants. Details of the purposes for which payments were made in 1988-89 are in the Secretary of State's annual report to Parliament published in July 1989.

32. Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on Government policy towards the transfer of unspent social fund allocations in social security offices from one year to the next.

Mr. Scott: Local office allocations are made for a financial year. Unspent balances at the end of a financial year are not available for expenditure in the following year. We have no plans to change these arrangements.

36. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of applications for grants and loans from the social fund rejected on original application are successful on appeal.

Mr. Scott: Between 1 April 1989 and 31 August 1989, nearly 26 per cent. (based on provisional figures) of applications for first review were successful. Information given to me by the social fund commissioner, shows that on second review, social fund inspectors either substituted their own decisions or referred cases back to the social fund officer in 38 per cent. (based on provisional figures) of the applications for review made to them.

39. Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people received help from the social fund in its first year of operation.

Mr. Scott: Over a million people received help from the social fund in 1988-89 through the payment of 884,000 interest-free loans and 153,000 non-repayable community care grants. Further details are in the Secretary of State's annual report to Parliament, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what information is available regarding delays in forwarding applications for review to the office of the social fund inspectors; and whether he has received any representations on this subject from social fund inspectors or the social fund commissioner.

Mr. Scott: The Social Fund Commissioner drew attention to such delays in her annual report. Remedial action has been taken by the Department to ensure that applications are referred promptly and this matter will be kept under review.

Child Benefit

20. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he poposes to uprate child benefit for the next relevant year.

23. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security to what extent child benefit changes this year will take into account inflation over the past three years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: An announcement about benefit rates will be made shortly.

24. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has any plans to introduce legislation to make attendance at post-natal or child health clinics a condition of receiving child benefit.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: No. The promotion of perinatal care is the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Budgeting Loans

21. Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people on income support have received interest-free budgeting loans from the social fund in its first year of operation.

Mr. Scott: Some 505,000 budgeting loans were awarded in 1988-89. Further details are in the Secretary of State's annual report to Parliament published in July 1989.

Disability Income

22. Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress his Department is making towards the introduction of a comprehensive disability income scheme.

44. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department is examining ways to introduce a comprehensive disability income scheme.

Mr. Scott: We have already spent some £7·3 billion on disability benefits, an increase of 90 per cent. in real terms since 1979. We have received a number of representations from disability organisations about the introduction of a comprehensive disability income. Whilst these proposals warrant consideration the extra cost of such a scheme is a significant obstacle. We shall, however, consider carefully all the comments made on the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys reports on disability.

Homeless People

25. Mr. Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has any proposals to increase the financial support for young single homeless people.

35. Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has any proposals to increase the financial support for young single homeless people.

45. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has any proposals to increase the financial support for young single homeless people.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The normal range of benefits available to young single people is also available to those who are homeless. My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State will be making the general uprating statement soon.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give details of the percentage of his Department's budget expended on the homeless each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The homeless are, in general, entitled to social security benefits on the same basis as everyone else. I regret, therefore, that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list all benefits within his responsibility available to homeless persons.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There are no benefits specifically for the homeless, but they may claim a wide range of benefits subject to the usual qualifying conditions.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to prevent financial hardship being caused to homeless persons as a result of the recent changes in legislation.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: People without accommodation continue to be entitled to claim benefit in the usual way.

Computerisation

27. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how plans for computerisation of the social security system will benefit claimants in Fylde.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Department's plans for the computerisation of the social security system will benefit claimants in Fylde and the rest of the United Kingdom by introducing computer systems which will process claims faster, reduce payment errors and provide a quick and more efficient enquiry service.

43. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the progress of the social security computerisation programme.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The social security computerisation programme is coming to fruition according to plan. The three major computer projects, the departmental central index, the pensions and income support computer systems have been piloted in 23 social security offices. A rolling programme of national implementation, which will extend the systems to all social security offices, will start this month.

Disability Benefits Review

28. Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has formally to consult organisations of and for disabled people about the overall structure of the disability benefits review.

30. Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how he proposes formally to consult disability organisations on the review of disability benefits.

Mr. Scott: I have received a number of representations about the format of the disability benefits review and am keen to encourage comments on the Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys reports from organisations of and for disabled people and others.

38. The Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has had an opportunity to consider the financial implications of the disability benefits review.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) earlier today.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what research his Department is undertaking into the benefits received by carers, including invalid care allowance, in preparation for the forthcoming review of disability benefits; and when the results of such research will be publicly available.

Mr. Scott: We have commissioned the social policy research unit at the university of York to undertake a study of invalid care allowance and its financial and economic effects for carers. We have not yet received the final report of the study or agreed a date for publication.

Lone Parents

29. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will seek to ensure that absent husbands and fathers accept their responsibility for supporting lone parent families.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Government are naturally concerned that absent parents should meet their responsibilities for their children as far as possible.

When a lone parent claims income support the Department tries to obtain maintenance from the absent parent for his dependants. The Department can take proceedings if he refuses to make payments which it appears he can afford. In addition the lone parent can apply direct to the courts for maintenance from the absent parent. It is for the courts to decide in the circumstances of the case whether and how much maintenance to award.

34. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone mothers receiving income support do not receive any maintenance.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The most recent figures available are for May 1988 and show that maintenance was not paid for some 530,000 lone mothers in receipt of income support at that time.

Source: Income Support Annual Statistical Enquiry 1988.

Benefits (Uprating)

33. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy that the uprating of benefits next April will include an increase based on inflation for those in receipt of transitional protection.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Income support special transitional additions are increased in line with inflation. Other transitional protection, including housing benefit non-statutory payments, is not increased.

Over-75s

37. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will introduce new pension rates for the over-75s to take account of the losses suffered from the severing of the link between pension and earnings rates.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Restoring the link between pensions and earnings is not the key factor in improving pensioners' incomes. In recognition of the fact that not all pensioners shared equally in the 23 per cent. real terms increases in pensioners' average total net income between 1979 and 1986, we introduced new and enhanced premiums into the income support and housing benefit schemes on 9 October this year. Disabled pensioners and those aged 75 and over will benefit by up to £2·50 a week (single) and £3·50 a week (couple).

Pensions

40. Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by what percentage he intends to increase pensions in this year's uprating.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Retirement pension will be increased by 7·6 per cent. with effect from 9 April 1990. The increase will take full account of the movement in the retail prices index over the 12 months to September 1989.

52. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which index he proposes to use this year in uprating pensions.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: This year, as in previous years, my right hon. Friend will uprate pensions in line with the movement in the retail prices index.

Disability

41. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has, in the light of the findings of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys' surveys, to increase the allocation of resources to people with disabilities.

46. Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what additional resources he is committing to implement the proposed review of disability benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Members to my reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) earlier today.

Residential Care Homes

42. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the average increase in costs of residential care homes for the elderly since 1 April.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is not available in the form requested.

The Government take account of a number of different pieces of evidence in reviewing the amount of income support available to people in residential care homes each year. These include detailed and differing representations received from various sources about the level of costs in homes. The results of this review will be announced shortly.

Transitional Protection

47. Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants he expects will not receive the full uprating of their benefit next April as a result of transitional protection.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones) earlier today.

Bed-and-breakfast Accommodation

48. Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how may people were in bed-and-breakfast accommodation at the latest available date; and what was the equivalent figure five years previously.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest available information is that there were 88,500 income support beneficiaries living in board and lodging accommodation in February 1989.

No figures are available for February 1984 but there were 106,000 supplementary benefit recipients living in board and lodging accommodation in December 1984.

Family Credit

49. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about the number of eligible families who fail to claim family credit.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest information relates to 1988 when a special examination of family expenditure survey returns indicated that the total eligible employee population was then about 500,000 families. This compared with an average live load (including eligible cases awaiting award) during the same period of about 253,000. The live load is now around 315,000, but the number of eligible families cannot be estimated until information from the 1989 family expenditure survey becomes available.

Single Payments

50. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the amount paid in single payments in the last full year in which such payments were last available.

Mr. Scott: The amount paid in single payments in 1987-88 was £214 million.

Child Poverty Action Group

51. Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he last met the Child Poverty Action Group; and what matters were discussed.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: My right hon. Friend met representatives of the Child Poverty Action Group on Tuesday 10 October. Discussion ranged widely and covered a large number of topics.

Mobility Allowance

53. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether further changes are planned to the rules governing mobility allowance.

Mr. Scott: We shall be looking at mobility allowance in common with all other benefits for the long-term sick and disabled as we assess the implications of all the results of the OPCS surveys.

Personal Pension Plans

54. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the latest figure he has for the number of people opting for personal pension plans.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Just over 3·5 million people have so far applied for an appropriate personal pension.

Family Benefits

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will detail the benefits which would be available to (a) a single unemployed parent with two school-age children, (b) a married unemployed couple with two school-age children, (c) a single working parent with two school-age children and (d) a married couple with one parent working with two school-age children on (i) half average earning, (ii) national average earnings and (iii) twice average earnings.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is shown in the tables.

Married couple 2 children aged 13 and 16

Unemployed families receiving income support are also eligible for free school meals and exemption from NHS charges. Working families receiving family credit are eligible for exemption from NHS charges.

[1] Average male earnings 1989-90 assumed to be £275·10 a week.

[2] Average female earnings 1989-90 assumed to be £183·80 a week.

[3] Each family is assumed to live in local authority accommodation appropriate to its size and paying estimated average rent and rates.

Notes:

Family credit for both family types runs out at gross earnings of £182 pw.

Family credit eligibility is conditional upon one adult in the family working 24 or more hours a week.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the current level of child benefit was fixed; and by how much inflation has since increased.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The current level of child benefit is £7·25 per week and came into effect on 6 April 1987. The movement in the index of retail prices between April 1987 and September 1989 was 14·6 per cent.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when was the present level of single-parent child benefit increased last and by how much inflation has since risen.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: One-parent benefit was last increase in April 1989. Between April and September the index of retail prices rose by 2·1 per cent.

Young People

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assistance is given by his Department to young people leaving local authority children's homes to live as independent adults, and whether he has any proposals for further assistance.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Those 16 and 17 year olds living independently who were in care immediately before their sixteenth birthday may claim income support for a period of 12-16 weeks after they leave school (known as the child benefit extension period), provided that they register for YTS or work. They may also claim housing benefit.

Certain categories of young people are eligible to claim income support beyond the child benefit extension period. In addition, the Secretary of State has the power to direct that, where unavoidable hardship would result if benefit were withheld, a young person will be entitled to income support even though that person would not originally be entitled to it.

Since July 1989, all 16 and 17-year-olds who have good reason to live independently, including those leaving care, have been entitled to the higher income support personal allowance payable to 18 to 24-year-olds. Housing benefit allowances were also increased for all 16 to 17-year-olds with housing commitments.

Young people of 18 and over may claim income support provided that they are registered for work. They may also claim housing benefit.

In assessing benefit entitlement for these young people, payments made by local authorities under section 1 of the Child Care Act 1980 or section 12 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 are disregarded. We have recently extended this disregard to payments under sections 27 and 29 of the Child Care Act and sections 24 and 26 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act.

Young people leaving care may also seek help from the social fund. In particular they may apply for community care grants to help with the expenses of setting up a home provided they meet the qualifying conditions.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what steps he proposes to take to alleviate the problems caused for those persons aged 16 and 17 years by the lack of availability of benefit, even when they become unavoidably homeless;

(2) what steps he proposes to take to alleviate the problems caused within some low-income families by non-availability of benefit to those aged 16 and 17 years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The best course for 16 and 17-year-olds who leave school and do not take up further education or a job is to participate in the youth training scheme. We have developed the scheme to provide good quality training. Youngsters taking part are paid a weekly allowance and do not, therefore, need to rely on benefit.

However, we have acknowledged that certain young people nevertheless need income support in their own right. In addition to lone parents, the disabled and the long-term sick, who can receive benefit without time restriction, young people forced to live independently can claim income support during a limited period after leaving school, known as the child benefit extension period. They can also receive housing benefit.

Moreover, we introduced a package of changes in July which recognised the particular difficulties being experienced by some 16 and 17-year-olds with no option but to live away from home. An important element of this was to pay them higher rates of both income support and housing benefit.

In addition, my right hon. Friend has discretion to enable income support to be paid to a 16 or 17-year-old to prevent "severe hardship". Factors taken into account in determining whether there would otherwise be severe hardship include the vulnerability of the young person, particularly to becoming homeless. Homeless young people in night shelters are now considered automatically under the severe hardship provisions.

The parents of 16 or 17-year-olds who remain dependent may continue to receive child benefit during the child benefit extension period. During this time they may also be eligible for dependency additions to their own benefits, such as income support, family credit and housing benefit.

We have therefore taken steps to ensure that benefit is available to all who need it, but we shall continue to monitor the 1988 social security reforms, including those affecting young people.

Correspondence

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne can expect a reply to his letter of 4 April regarding pension arrangements affecting Mrs. E. D. Timmins of 27 Grovehill crescent, Falmouth, Cornwall.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We have no trace of having received this particular letter from my hon. Friend. If he could let us have a copy we will endeavour to reply as soon as possible.

Dyslexia

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what guidelines his Department has issued to local social fund officers concerning applications for community care grants or crisis loans for the payment of fees for the assessment of dyslexia in the children of claimants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: None. However, the Secretary of State's directions to social fund officers preclude any award in respect of a medical service or an educational need. And, in the case of crisis loans, a social fund officer must be satisfied that an award is the only means by which serious damage or serious risk to the health or safety of the applicant, or to a member of his family, may be prevented.

Hostels

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give details of the amount of benefit lost to persons who move from one hostel to another and the reasons for such loss.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: People in hostels who were receiving income support immediately before 9 October are eligible for compensatory payments to make good any shortfall in their total benefit income. The amount of any such payment varies according to an individual's circumstances. When a claimant leaves a hostel the compensatory payments to the claimant cease. This permits the Department to pay over the money due to the hostel instead, thus protecting hostel finances in accordance with the undertaking given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore) on 16 March, Official Report, column 546.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give details of the change in benefit entitlement of a person in a hostel who is in receipt of the protected sum.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: From 9 October 1989, people in hostels became eligible for housing benefit to help with their accommodation costs and normal income support personal allowances plus any appropriate premiums for other day-to-day expenses. People in hostels who were receiving income support immediately before 9 October are eligible for compensatory payments to make good any shortfall between the new and old levels of benefit for as long as they remain in the same hostel. They will therefore suffer no reduction in overall benefit entitlement as a direct result of the change in benefit arrangements.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give details of the financial savings to his Department arising from the changes in legislation regarding people's entitlement to benefit when living in a hostel.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The aim of the change is to achieve a simple, more rational and more comprehensible social security system while at the same time protecting hostels and claimants. There will be no reduction in the amount of money available to hostels.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give details on the entitlement to the protected sum paid to people when they transfer from one hostel to another; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Where an income support recipient changes or vacates his or her hostel, any entitlement to a compensatory payment ceases. The claimant is eligible for both income support personal allowances and premiums as appropriate, and housing benefit at the new address.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the circumstances under which the protective sum paid to people living in hostels will be reduced or removed.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: People in hostels are eligible for compensatory payments of income support if they would otherwise have received less benefit overall because of the changes in benefit arrangements introduced on 9 October 1989. These payments will be reduced by any subsequent increase in the normal rate of income support in payment. They will end either where the person changes or vacates his or her hostel or when he or she ceases to be entitled to income support. Exceptionally, entitlement to compensatory payments can continue where a person leaves his or her hostel for a period of 14 weeks or less because of hospitalisation or ceases to be entitled to income support for a period of eight weeks or less (or, in the case of certain persons who have become engaged in remunerative work for at least six weeks, 12 weeks or less), provided that in either case the person returns to or remains in the same hostel.

Sickness Benefit

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about the claim to sickness benefit of Mr. K. Oduntan (DSS Ref. RM 173P/C0999/71/083/3) and the reasons for the delay in resolving this matter.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The office for the determination of contribution questions sent a letter about Mr. Oduntan's claim to the hon. Member on 18 October 1989. The letter included a history of the case, detailed the up-to-date position and gave an explanation for any delay.

Income Support Regulations

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security from what date the Income Support (General) Amendment No. 3 Regulations 1989, laid before Parliament on 15 September 1989 and due to be in force on 2 October, were not available to hon. Members; why they were not available after being laid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Scott: Copies of the regulations were dispatched to the Vote Office on 15 September, the date on which they were laid before Parliament, according to normal practice. The regulations came into force on 9 October.

Attendance Allowance

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many officials of his Department and of what grade are engaged in drafting delegated medical officers' reasoned decisions on attendance allowance claims; and what training and guidance they receive from the Attendance Allowance Board.

Mr. Scott: Of the officials made available to act as officers and servants of the attendance allowance board 15 (1 HEO and 14 EOs) are engaged in drafting reasoned decisions on behalf of delegated medical practitioners, from whom they receive instructions and guidance about how the decisions should be expressed. The officials are not involved in the decision-making process.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will review the adjudication procedures for attendance allowance, in the light of the view expressed by the social security commissioners in decision CA/130/1988 in favour of a right of appeal to a medical appeal tribunal.

Mr. Scott: This is one of the aspects of the attendance allowance scheme that we shall be looking at in the light of the results of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys disability surveys.

Haemophiliacs (HIV)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the Minister for the Disabled has received any representations in regard to settling out of court the claims of haemophiliacs who have been contaminated with the HIV virus by the injection of blood products supplied under the National Health Service; what replies have been sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I have received two representations from the right hon. Member on this subject. I replied to the first letter on 2 October and will shortly reply to the other. I have today placed a copy of my reply of 2 October in the Library. A number of other representations have also been received by my hon. and right hon. Friends in the Department of Health, who have responsibility for this subject.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

EC Membership (Cost)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will bring up to date tables (a) D, (b) 4(e)1, (c) 4(e)2, *(d)*f1, and (e) B, in his Department's submission to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on the "Financial and Economic Consequences of United Kingdom Membership of the European Economic Community" in Session 1984-85 (HC 57-II).

Mr. Curry: The statistics requested at (a), (d) and (e) are shown in tables 1 to 3. The information at (b), relating to non-Community countries, is shown in table 4. Data on yields in the European Community are contained in the Commission's publication "The Agricultural Situation in the Community—1988 Report", available in the Library of the House. This publication also contains (pT/38) the information requested at (c).

Sheep Imports

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many sheep in each of the last three years have been imported into the United Kingdom from the Isle of Man; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The numbers of live sheep imported into the United Kingdom from the Isle of Man over the last three years are as follows:

Sheepmeat

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much sheepmeat has been imported into the United Kingdom from the Isle of Man in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The amount of sheepmeat imported into the United Kingdom from the Isle of Man over the last three years is as follows:

Battery Fowls

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why his Department has withdrawn funding from research into the condition of battery fowls being transported to, and in the process of, slaughter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: We accord high priority to safeguarding poultry welfare, and as such commission a substantial programme of related research, amounting to some £1·1 million in 1988-89. The overall level of funding in this area is not being reduced.

Much of the current research is investigating aspects of the condition of birds around the time of harvesting, transport and slaughter.

An initial contract revealed the extent of bone breakage in laying hens, and the results of this work are being published. We are considering proposals for further work in this area, to complement ongoing research and address the underlying causes of bone breakages in poultry.

The current research is being carried out by the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service, the Agriculture and Food Research Council and the universities.

The industry, through the British Egg Industry Council is also funding two research projects on aspects of broken bones in hens.

Battery Eggs Production

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether his Department has undertaken any research on, or monitoring of, the decision of the Swiss Government to phase out battery egg production by 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I am aware of moves in a number of countries to phase out battery egg production. The Government will ensure that these developments are taken into account by the European Commission in the review of the EC directive on battery hens, which is due to be completed by the end of 1992.

DEFENCE

Consultants

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many consultant companies or groups have been commissioned by his Department in each of the past three years; what was the total value of the contracts; how many of these consultants were from Scotland and England, respectively; and what was the total value of contracts won by Scottish companies or groups.

Mr. Neubert: The Ministry of Defence holds records only for management and IT consultancies commissioned centrally. In the case of management consultancies the number of contracts and total fees paid in the last three financial years are as follows:

FY	£ million	Consultants Commissioned
1986-87	6·2	44
1987-88	5·1	37
1988-89	3·1	20

In the case of IT consultancies, which are contracted through the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA), information exists only on total fees. This is as follows:

FY	£ million
1986-87	14·5
1987-88	14·8
1988-89	5·0

The records do not make any distinction between Scottish or English companies. Most of the larger companies used do, however, have offices in Scotland.

Proof and Experimental Establishments

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many proof and experimental establishments exist; and how many are located in Scotland.

Mr. Neubert: There are six proof and experimental establishments (P and EEs) of which one, P and EE Inchterf, is in Scotland (near Glasgow).

Volunteer Reserves

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many volunteer reserves operate in Scotland; and what proportion of the total numbers that represents.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As at 1 April 1989, the total strength of the volunteer reserves operating in Scotland was 9,606, representing 11·8 per cent. of the overall total.

Service Men (Benefits)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will detail the benefits which have been or will be removed from service men as mentioned in paragraph 518, page 42 of Cm. 675–I.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The new allowances package referred to in Cm. 675–I introduced a number of changes designed to improve assistance to service men when they are relocated, to remove to a large extent the differences of treatment between single and married personnel, and to benefit seagoers. The aim was that the overall expenditure on the new package should be broadly the same as the old. Those allowances which were considered less appropriate to modern conditions, and which have been or are being removed are as follows:

(a) United Kingdom travel warrants for single personnel over 25 and married personnel were reduced from four to two per year. First class leave travel for senior officers was discontinued.

(b) Army and RAF married personnel who opted to serve voluntarily unaccompanied on their next posting after 1 October 1988 were required to pay for their accommodation. They also lost entitlement to separation allowance and separation warrants.

(c) Residence to place of duty travel reimbursement for those in private accommodation is being phased out, although in certain circumstances service personnel may be paid the cost of excess fares.

(d) The resettlement and 50-plus assisted house purchase scheme will cease to be available from 30 September 1994.

Contractors

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give a breakdown by region of the companies on the defence contractors' list.

Mr. Neubert: A breakdown by region of companies currently registered on the defence contractors' list (DCL) is as follows:

	Numbers

Some companies have a number of sites registered on the DCL and the above figures therefore add up to more than the number of individual companies on the DCL (10,371). The two figures could be reconciled only at a disproportionate cost.

Security Zones

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the Warsaw pact strategies referred to in paragraph 206, page 6, of Cm. 675-I; and if he will make a statement on zones of different levels of security and the acceptability to Her Majesty's Government and the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: On 9 March 1989, the Warsaw pact presented its initial proposals at the conventional armed forces in Europe (CFE) talks in Vienna. Those called, among other things, for NATO and the Warsaw pact to reduce their holdings of tanks, artillery, armoured troop carriers, aircraft, helicopters and military manpower to a level 10-15 per cent. below the holdings of the weaker alliance. The proposals also called for the establishment of "zones of reduced levels of armaments" along borders between NATO and Warsaw pact nations. Since then, they have put forward revised, alternative proposals on zonal arrangements.

NATO has always opposed suggestions for zones of different levels of security, which imply that different nations within the Alliance should be obliged to accept different levels of security. The purpose of the NATO Alliance, and the CFE proposals which it has put forward, is to enhance and maintain security throughout Europe, and the Alliance's proposal for a series of geographical sub-limits on forces is designed to achieve equal security for all from the Atlantic to the Urals.

Odessa (Challenge Inspection)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the name and rank of the United Kingdom personnel who exercised a challenge inspection of a Soviet exercise in the Odessa region; and what was the duration of their visit.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Two lieutenant colonels, one squadron leader, and one Army captain formed the inspection team which arrived at midnight on 9 April 1988 and left 46 hours later. It is not our policy to release the names of the individuals concerned.

Staff Interchange Scheme

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the companies involved in his Department's staff interchange scheme.

Research Establishments

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the non-nuclear defence research establishments, showing the numbers employed in each and their geographical location.

Mr. Neubert: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my predecessor to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) on 8 May at column 291-92.

Navy Vessels

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the Royal Navy vessels built in each of the past 15 years, showing the cost of each and the yards in which they were constructed.

Mr. Neubert: Details of major ships and submarines accepted into service since 1974-75 are as follows:

[2] Batch order for both vessels, total cost £75 million.
[3] The cost of the purchase and conversion of the three vessels FIPVs was £16·7 million.

Costs, where shown, are at the price base that applied at the time the vessel was delivered or, if marked [1], are at out-turn prices as previously published in the Supply Estimates.

Since 1987, it has not been our practice to give unit cost information for the reasons stated by my hon. Friend on 14 January 1988, Official Report, col. 373. Costs are therefore not shown for vessels where further vessels of the class were under construction in 1987.

In addition to the above, the following vessels are currently under construction:

Staff (Directorships)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those of his Department's senior staff who are non-executive directors of major companies, together with the companies.

Mr. Neubert: The following MOD senior staff are currently non-executive directors:

Name	Grade	Company
J. C. Mabberley	3	Automated Security
M. J. Harte	3	Glaxochem
B. A. E. Taylor	3	North British Newsprint
D. E. Humphries	3	Thorn EMI
K. G. Hambleton	3	Dowty Seals
D. R. Morris	5	Rank Organisation
A. J. D. Pawson	5	Cleanaway Ltd.

Officers (Dismissals)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy in future defence estimate statements to indicate the number of officers and officers-designate whose reason for leaving the services comes within the categories "unsatisfactory" and "discipline".

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Outflow from the services of officers and officers-designate whose reason for leaving comes within the categories unsatisfactory and discipline are already included in table 4.18 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1989" volume 2 (Cm. 675-II) under the heading "other reasons", which has a similar coverage to the "Unsatisfactory, disciplinary and other reasons" sub-heading shown for servicemen and service women. The officers' "other reasons" sub-heading will be changed in future editions of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates" to make this clear. A more detailed breakdown in separate unsatisfactory and disciplinary categories is not available.

Expenditure Statistics

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the proportions of expenditure in (a) Scotland and (b) the south-east of England for each industry group heading, in the year 1986-87, as set out in table 2.5 of Cm. 675-II.

Mr. Neubert: Estimates of the regional breakdown of the figures in table 2.5 are not available and could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Recruitment

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what detailed studies his Department has conducted on recruitment and the demographic trough; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Army has undertaken a study on manning and recruiting in the lean years of the nineties, better known as the Marilyn report, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The Ministry of Defence has also conducted a number of internal reviews covering the three services. As a result, a wide range of measures are being taken to step up our recruiting effort and to improve retention.

East Germany and Poland (Defence Cuts)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has of East German and Polish cuts in troop numbers, tanks and aircraft over the period 1988-1991.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Following President Gorbachev's announcement in late 1988 about intended Soviet force reductions, East Germany announced that it would make unilateral cuts of 10,000 troops, 600 tanks, and 50 aircraft, and Poland announced that it would cut 40,000 troops, 850 tanks, and 80 aircraft, in the period up to 1991. Some of these cuts have already taken place. It is difficult to forecast progress, but we have no reason to believe that they will not adhere to their reduction programmes.

Spares

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of expenditure on spares in 1988-89; and what proportion was taken by suppliers located in (a) Scotland and (b) south-east England.

Mr. Neubert: Total estimated expenditure on spares in 1988-89 was approximately £1,635 million. A breakdown of this expenditure by region could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

RAF Contracts

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total value of RAF contracts, in the latest available year, to external contractors, at Linton-on-Ouse, Shawbury and Church Fenton.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In the current financial year, the total value of RAF contracts placed with external contractors at RAF Linton-on-Ouse, RAF Shawbury and RAF Church Fenton is approximately £9·6 million.

Medical Research

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what part of his Department's medical expenditure is devoted to medical research within military establishments.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: This information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Volunteer Reserves

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the turnover rate of the volunteer reserves in Scotland in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I regret that this information is not available in the form requested.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the turnover rate of the volunteer reserves in the past year.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The outflow from the volunteer reserve forces during training year 1988-89 was 25,705, representing a turnover of 29·7 per cent. against strength at the beginning of the year. This outflow includes some 700 other ranks who left to take up commissions in the regular forces.

Non-strategic Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when a decision on modernisation of the United Kingdom's non-strategic nuclear weapons is to be taken.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The studies into a number of options for the possible replacement of the WE 177 free-fall bomb are continuing. It is not yet possible to forecast when a decision may be taken.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether work undertaken at the Chemical Defence Establishment is capable of conversion to the production of offensive chemical weapons.

Mr. Neubert: The role of the Chemical Defence Establishment is to provide effective protective measures for the United Kingdom Armed Forces against the threat that chemical or biological weapons may be used against them. The United Kingdom abandoned all offensive chemical warfare work over 30 years ago and CDE has no facilities capable of conversion to significant production of offensive chemical weapons.

Major Equipment Projects

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which companies are the main contractors for the major equipment projects set out in table 3.2 of Cm. 675-II; and how many of these have head offices located in (a) Scotland and (b) England.

Mr. Neubert: The main contractors for the major equipment projects set out in table 3.2 of Cm. 675-II are as follows:

Project	Main contractor
Trident	VSEL Consortium plc
Type 23 Frigate	Yarrow Shipbuilders Ltd.
Single Role Minehunter	Vosper Thorneycroft (UK) Ltd.

Of these, two have their major works in Scotland and 10 in England.

Operational Fuels

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which companies have contracts to supply operational fuels to the armed services; and how many of these companies have their head offices in (a) Scotland and (b) England.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence currently holds contracts with 28 different companies for the supply of operational fuels to the armed services. Of these, two have their head offices in Scotland and 17 have their head offices in England.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which firms of consultants have been commissioned to study recruitment of ethnic minorities to the armed services; and what is the value of each contract.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The contract for the study into ethnic minority recruitment to the armed services was placed with Peat Marwick McLintock, who conducted the study in conjunction with their sub-contractors, Mass Observation. It is not our practice to disclose the value of such contracts.

Belize (Accommodation)

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration is being given to the replacement of locally-rented accommodation for service families on Belize by purpose-built accommodation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Taking into account the uncertainty over the period British Forces will remain in Belize, it has been previously assessed that it would not be cost-effective to replace locally rented accommodation for families in Belize with purpose-built accommodation. We are currently in the process of looking at this matter again, although no decision has yet been reached.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has to improve the single and married accommodation of Her Majesty's forces serving in Belize.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We are currently in the middle of a five-year programme for the replacement of the older single accommodation in Belize, which is due to be completed in 1992. We are also in the middle of rebuilding the 10 old-style married quarters in Airport camp, which will be replaced by 1991.

Service Pay

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the percentage and actual increases in pay for each year since 1964 for (a) at private rank, (b) at sergeant rank, (c) at captain rank and (d) at a major, and for the equivalent Royal Air Force and Royal Navy rank, in each case.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The present system of pay in the Armed Forces, which introduced what is known as the military salary, was implemented in two stages in 1970 and 1971.

Prior to this, service men were paid partly in cash and partly by the provision of free food and accommodation, with different rates for married personnel. Information on these earlier rates of pay is not readily available and would not in any case be comparable with the present system. Rates of pay and the increase from 1971 are set out in the table. The variations in percentage increases between the ranks in some years of the 1970s arose in part from the effects of various income policies in force at the time and subsequent catching-up awards.

[1]The pay of non-commissioned ranks is divided into different pay bands according to their technical and other skills. The pay shown is for the middle pay band and for personnel committed to between six to nine years service. Pay for RAF and RN personnel of equivalent ranks is broadly similar but full pay banding is not used in the RN and minor variations can therefore occur.

[2]Officers are paid on a scale related to the number of years in rank. The rates shown are for the top of the scale. There is no difference for the pay of equivalent ranks in the RN and RAF.

European Fighter Aircraft

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are being taken to resolve the outstanding decision on the choice of radar for the European fighter aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Since taking office my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has met his German opposite number of two occasions during which the choice of radar for European fighter aircraft was considered. Further meetings will take place with the Defence Minister of European fighter aircraft nations as necessary. Senior officials are also in regular contact with their counterparts in the other European fighter aircraft countries. Every opportunity is taken during these meetings to seek an early resolution of this issue.

Colonial Service Pensions

Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to clear the back-log of claims for certification of war service submitted by colonial service pensioners at the Army records office, Hayes.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Of the 2,551 inquiries received by the Army record office at Hayes for verification of war service, 2,342 have been completed and returned to the Overseas Development Administration. The outstanding 209 await further information from the ex-service men themselves or from the Department of Social Security before they can be verified and returned to the Overseas Development Administration.

Bird Strike Risk

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultation have taken place since 1983 between officials of his Department or service personnel and representatives of the Nature Conservancy Council to discuss bird strike risk in low-level flying exercises; and the possible effects of such exercises on seabird colonies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neubert: I am not aware of any formal discussions between my Department and the Nature Conservancy Council on bird strike risk in low flying exercises, but areas of major bird concentrations, including the locations of major seabird colonies in Scotland, are notified to aircrew who will take account of the potential hazards in the planning and execution of their low-flying sorties. My Department also has regular discussions with the Nature Conservancy Council, at which matters of mutual concern, including the effect of low-flying aircraft on seabird colonies, are discussed.

Land, Wales

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will indicate how much land has been purchased by his Department to add to that already owned by them on Mynydd Eppynt in Brecon and Radnor in the following years: (a) 1987, (b) 1988 and (c) the present year to 30 September.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 6 July 1988 at column 646. A further 25 acres in the Brecon and Radnor areas have been purchased from the Forestry Commission this year.

Holy Loch

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has of the contribution to the local economy made by the United States Government as a result of the use of Holy Loch by the United States Navy and as to who benefits therefrom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend, the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) on 9 May 1989 at column 426.

TRANSPORT

Network SouthEast

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of public subsidy for Network SouthEast in each of the past three years.

Mr. Portillo: Figures for Government support paid to the British Railways board, including public service obligations grant under EC regulation 1191/69 and section 3 of the Railways Act 1974, and level crossings grant under EC regulation 1192/69, are given in the table. Final claims have not yet been agreed.

The table also shows the figures for total investment by British Rail in the railways.

£m cash (rounded to nearest £m)

	Grant	Investment
1986-87	709	399
1987-88	782	526
1988-89	557	570

In the annual report and accounts for 1987-88 British Rail estimated the PSO grant requirement for Network SouthEast at £231 million; in 1988-89 British Rail put NSE's requirement at £141 million.

Air Traffic Movements

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all planning or other environmental measures limiting air traffic movements at (a) Heathrow airport and (b) other airports in the United Kingdom.

Mr. McLoughlin: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to seek it from the airports direct.

BAA (Land)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the acreage and asset value of land owned by BAA at the time of its privatisation at each of the airports in its ownership; and what assurances were sought from the management of BAA plc regarding the future disposal of such land;

(2) what was the value of the total land owned by BAA at Prestwick airport at the time of privatisation.

Mr. McLoughlin: The 1987 BAA company accounts show the following gross current cost valuations for freehold property, comprising land and buildings, at the seven BAA airports:

	£ thousand
Heathrow	624,100
Gatwick	181,000
Stansted	49,106
Glasgow	46,617
Edinburgh	27,942
Prestwick	27,552
Aberdeen	19,220

The prospectus isued when BAA plc shares were offered for sale showed the acreages of the principal properties of the BAA group at 8 July 1987 as follows:

	Acres
Heathrow	2,750
Gatwick	1,642
Stansted	2,406
Glasgow	699
Edinburgh	873
Prestwick	555
Aberdeen	497

In addition, the company held approximately 1,815 acres of land and buildings which were not directly or immediately required for airport operations.

BAA's articles of association provide that the company may not dispose of an airport designated for the purposes of economic regulation under the 1986 Act without the prior consent of the holder of the special share. This may only be held by a Minister or other person acting on behalf of the Crown. Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted are the BAA airports currently designated and my right hon. Friend holds the share.

Scottish Lowlands Airports Policy

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those officials and advisers who will be involved in carrying out the consultation exercise on Scottish lowland airports policy.

Mr. McLoughlin: No. The consultation is being conducted by the Department of Transport in association with the Scottish Office. My right hon. Friend will consider the Government's policy in the light of the responses received.

Flight Diversions

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions have flights been diverted from (a) Glasgow and (b) other airports to Prestwick airport since 1980.

Mr. McLoughlin: This information is published monthly and annually by the Civil Aviation Authority, and copies are placed in the library. The relevant figures are as follows:

Year	Landings diverted to Prestwick from Glasgow	Landings diverted to Prestwick from other United Kingdom and from overseas airports
1980	148	67
1981	123	100
1982	38	47
1983	35	62
1984	77	59
1985	71	74
1986	15	65
1987	43	74
1988	66	87

West London Assessment Study

Sir Barney Hayhoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what consultation arrangements he is making to ensure that local opinion is taken into account before Government decisions are made on the issues covered by his consultants' stage 2B report of the west London assessment study;

(2) when he expects to receive the stage 2B report of the west London assessment study from his consultants; and whether he will publish it without delay.

Mr. Atkins: We expect to receive reports from the consultants for all four London assessment studies in the next month or so. Arrangements for printing will be put in hand as soon as possible for publication early in December. The reports will be available for purchase and there will be free summaries. Displays will be offered at town halls and public libraries in the study areas.

In order to reduce uncertainty we intend to announce at the time the reports are published which options will not be considered further. We shall be inviting comments from local authorities, other organisations and members of the public before reaching firm decisions on the remaining options.

London Regional Transport (Anti-inflation Policy)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what advice, instructions or indications he has given to, London Regional Transport and its subsidiary undertakings concerning their part in supporting the anti-inflation policy of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Portillo: London Regional Transport is fully aware of the Government's determination to win the fight against inflation and I have satisfied myself that LRT appreciates the significance of its own pay and price increases. My right hon. Friend has no powers to issue instructions to LRT on these matters.

Air Traffic (Near Misses)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many near-miss cases over Orkney involving both civilian and military aircraft have been reported to the Civil Aviation Authority since 1 January 1985.

Mr. McLoughlin: There have been three reported airmisses over Orkney since 1 January 1985. Each involved civil and military aircraft and all were graded by the joint airmiss working group as category C—no risk.

Transatlantic Flights

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average real or notional extra cost for each transatlantic flight which has to use Prestwick as a gateway airport.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department does not hold the information needed to establish this figure.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police (Initiation Rites)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many policemen have been dismissed because of their involvement with initiation rites;

(2) how many policemen have had disciplinary action taken against them because of their involvement with initiation rites.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is not held centrally.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information is collected by his Department regarding the prevalence of initiation rites in the police forces.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No such information is being collected. It is the responsibility of chief officers of police to maintain discipline within their forces, and to investigate and deal with, severely if necessary, allegations of misconduct by their officers.

Electronic Tagging

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to ensure that private firms will be publicly answerable for their role in the penal system in relation to electronic tagging; what controls are envisaged with respect to subcontracting by Government contractors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Contracts have been awarded to two companies to operate experimental trials of electronic monitoring in three areas. The companies are accountable to the Home Office for their performance of those contracts, which permit the use of subcontractors only with the Home Office's prior approval.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the numbers, by grades, employed by his Department on 30 September who were (a) permanent staff, part-time counting as one, (b) permanent part-time staff and (c) casual staff.

Mr. Hurd: The total number of non-industrial staff in post on 23 October 1989 was 41,130, of whom 1,813 were part-time. I shall write to the hon. Member with a breakdown of this total by grade. Information for 30 September 1989 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Information on the numbers of casual staff recruited by the Department is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Pistons (Imports)

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his estimate is during the last three years of the level of imports in money and volume terms of pistons and piston rings for diesel engines; and what percentage of the United Kingdom market is covered by such imports.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Figures for imports are shown in the table. However, figures for the United Kingdom market for these products are not available.

Consumers' Rights

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to introduce legislation giving a legal right to customers who have purchased an article which cannot be satisfactorily repaired to have a refund or replacement from the supplier.

Mr. Forth: The Sale of Goods Act 1979 already provides adequate protection in these circumstances: if the consumer acts within a reasonable time, he can reject goods which are not of merchantable quality; after acceptance, the consumer is still entitled to claim damages. The Government intend to implement changes recommended by the Law Commissions (Cm. 137) which will clarify consumers' rights, in particular by replacing the present requirement of "merchantable quality" with a more up-to-date definition.

Shipbuilding

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) to which shipbuilding yards in the United Kingdom his Department would recommend a ship owner or broker to direct an inquiry for a series of 25,000 tonnes bulk carriers;

(2) to which shipbuilding yards in the United Kingdom his Department would recommend a ship owner or broker to direct an inquiry for a series of 15,000 tonnes mixed cargo vessels.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: If any such inquiry were to be received by my Department, the inquirer would be advised of a number of yards who could build the relevant ships. The placing of orders would of course be a commercial matter for the ship owner or broker and the shipbuilder.

Refrigerators

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to ensure that refrigerators are sold with accurate thermometers and that the refrigerators are set to adequate temperatures to ensure proper storage of food; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The Government have no plans at present to introduce legislation requiring the manufacture of domestic refrigerators with thermometers. All domestic refrigerators currently on the market with BEAB approval can meet the temperatures required to ensure the proper storage of food. The position regarding commercial refrigeration is being considered in the context of the revision food hygiene regulations and is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend, the Secretary of State for Health.

Industry Council

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Industry Council held on 26 September.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Council, at which I represented the United Kingdom, discussed a Commission proposal on the restructuring of the Italian steel industry and the present EC/US steel negotiations. A statement was also made by the Commission on the current state of the steel market. A draft resolution, setting out a programme for improving conditions for sub-contractors in the Community, was agreed by the Council. Discussion also took place on the Community's handicraft industry and there was a Commission presentation on the current proposal to extend the life of pharmaceutical patents.

German Democratic Republic (Imports)

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list those goods and products from the German Democratic Republic which are allowed to be imported into (a) the European Economic Community and (b) the Federal Republic of Germany free from tariff.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 23 October 1989]: The European Community's common external tariff applies to all goods from the German Democratic Republic (GDR). There are special arrangements for trade between the GDR and the Federal Republic under which authorised imports originating in the GDR are permitted duty-free entry into the Federal Republic. Goods on a list comprising most industrial categories may be traded between the GDR and the Federal Republic free of import duty and other restrictions. Re-exported goods are not automatically subject to import duties in other member states. Under the EC treaty's protocol on inner German trade, member states are able to take safeguard action against GDR goods entering their territory via the Federal Republic. If there are specific complaints about the entry of GDR goods into the United Kingdom by this route they should be made known to the DTI and FCO who regularly review this question with the Ministry of Economics in Bonn.

WALES

Health Service

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many new hospitals have been opened in each year since 1970 in Wales.

Mr. Grist: Ten new hospitals have been opened in Wales since 1970. Their names and years of opening are shown in the table:

1970—Bryn-y-Neuadd
1971—University Hospital of Wales
1978—Prince Charles Hospital
—Withybush Hospital
1980—Ysbyty Glan Clwyd
1984—Ysbyty Gwynedd
—Mold Community Hospital
1985—Princess of Wales Hospital
1986—Ystradgynlais Community Hospital
1987—Prestatyn Community Hospital

Note: New hospitals includes replacement buildings but excludes hospitals which reopened following a period of closure.

In addition there were two major developments of existing hospitals at Wrexham Maelor hospital and Morriston hospital, which were completed in 1985.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each Welsh health district the cost of the 10 most commonly performed operations in the National Health Service for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide the following information for the latest year for which statistics are available together with figures for 1979 and the period 1974 to 1979: (a) the number of general practitioners, (b) general practitioners' list sizes, (c) the number of nurses, (d) the number of junior hospital doctors, (e) the number of consultants, (f) the number of in-patients treated, (g) the number of out-patients treated and (h) the total spending on the National Health Service.

Mr. Grist: The information is shown in the table:

	1974	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1988

Roads

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the latest estimate of the cost of constructing the M4 link at Baglan; what is the length of time that the actual construction would take; and what is the latest date at which a decision could be taken to start the construction in April 1991.

Mr. Wyn Roberts [holding answer 23 October 1989]: Construction of the M4 Baglan-Lonlas section of the M4 is planned as three separate schemes as follows:

	Contract period (months)	Roads in Wales timeband for start	Estimated cost at November 1988 prices (Roads in Wales) £ million
Earlswood-Lonlas	36	Before April 1990	33
Briton Ferry-Earlswood	36	Between 1 April 1991 and 31 March 1994	48
Baglan-Briton Ferry	30	Between 1 April 1991 and 31 March 1994	35

Tenders have been invited for the Earlswood-Lonlas contract with a view to letting before the end of this financial year. Preparation work on the remaining schemes is proceeding in accordance with the Roads in Wales programme. The Briton Ferry-Earlswood and Baglan-Briton Ferry contracts will be let six months apart to achieve simultaneous completion. The decision to proceed will depend on the availability of finance. The time required for tendering procedures, including EC journal notification and for advance earthworks is around 12 months.

ENERGY

Nuclear Accident, Kyshtym

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when Her Majesty's Government received from the International Atomic Energy Agency a copy of the IAEA report, drafted by the Soviet Union, on the accident in 1957 at the nuclear facility at Kyshtym; what new information relevant to the United Kingdom is included in the report; and if he will place a copy in the Library.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The IAEA's report on a radiological accident in the southern Urals on 29 September 1957, provided by the State Committee on the Utilisation of Atomic Energy, was issued on 28 July 1989. It contains interesting information on radiation exposure and monitoring, but nothing which requires changes to present United Kingdom monitoring arrangements. I am arranging for a copy to be placed in the Library.

Oil Companies (Ministerial Meetings)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many ministerial meetings have been held with oil companies in the past 12 months.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend and I maintain close contact with oil companies active in the United Kingdom and meet them frequently.

Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the correspondence he or officials of his Department have had with the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament since 1 July, in the context of the involvement of his Department and Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament at the Hinkley C inquiry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament wrote to my Department on 10 July with a number of questions arising from earlier correspondence on plutonium accounting. A reply was sent on 4

September. In addition, a letter was sent to the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament on 18 July about the preparation of the annual plutonium statistics.

Oldbury

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the outcome of the International Atomic Energy Agency operational safety review team's visit to the Oldbury nuclear power plant; and what access to operational data in regard to plutonium production and dispatch was afforded to the Soviet inspector on the visit.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The principal conclusion of the International Atomic Energy Agency's operational safety review team (OSART) team was that the Oldbury nuclear power station is being operated at a high level of safety. The team also drew attention to a large number of other praiseworthy features, including the high degree of professionalism of station management and staff. They also considered that the plant was well prepared to respond to emergencies.

When the IAEA has finalised its report on the mission, I shall arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

Data on the plutonium content of irradiated fuel is held at each station and is published annually by my Department. The Soviet member of the OSART team would have been allowed access to such data but in the event he did not ask to see it.

Plutonium

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy of 28 July, Official Report, column 978, on plutonium, he is now in a position to make a decision on the format for future publication of civil plutonium data.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have nothing to add to the reply of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the hon. Member. The plutonium data for 1988-89 will be published shortly.

Magnox Power Stations

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current best estimate for (a) reprocessing costs and (b) decommissioning costs for Magnox nuclear power stations; and what estimate he has received from National Power and when.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Newport, West on 28 July, Official Report, column 981, if he will now state the total cost of (a) decommissioning, (b) dismantling and (c) guarding Magnox reactors during the next 10 decades.

Mr. Wakeham: The CEGB will be finalising its estimates of Magnox liabilities for publication in its report and accounts for 1988-89.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to the written answer to the hon. Member for Newport, West on 28 July, Official Report, column 981, when he was informed of the likely final total cost of decommissioning, dismantling and guarding Magnox nuclear reactors during the next 10 decades.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the statement that my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) made on 24 July, at column 744.

Colliery Closures

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many collieries where the Union of Democratic Mineworkers is the main or sole union, have closed since 1985; how many are under threat of closure; and if he will list them in chronological order.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Colliery closures are a matter for the British Coal Corporation. I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Oil and Pipelines Agency

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his responsibility for the Oil and Pipelines Agency.

Mr. Wakeham: Following the Government's decision to cease taking royalty in kind from 31 December 1988, the work of the Oil and Pipelines Agency has been progressively wound up and its only remaining role is that of managing agent for the Government pipeline and storage system (GPSS). In accordance with the decision announced by my predecessor in October last year responsibility for the GPSS was transferred from the Department of Energy to the Ministry of Defence on 1 April 1989. The Ministry of Defence has decided to retain the Oil and Pipelines Agency as managing agent for the GPSS and responsibility for the agency is therefore being transferred today with the approval of my right hon. Friend, the Prime Minister to my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Defence.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Nicaragua

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the aid provided to Nicaragua in 1988 and the current year to the most recent practicable date and state the amount allocated to each project.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1988 we provided £180,000 for disaster relief, following Hurricane Joan. In 1989 we have provided £80,000 for this purpose. Our share of European Community aid in 1988 was approximately £3·3 million. This included food aid, technical assistance for agricultural reform and emergency aid. No figures are available for 1989.

Details of amounts provided for projects jointly funded with British voluntary agencies are available for the financial year 1988-89 but not for calendar years 1988 and 1989. They are:

Agricultural development programme	867
Installation of potable water supplies	5,961
Traditional medicine programme	4,546
Bee-keeping	2,500
Esteli herbs	20,257
Las Segovias mother and child programme	4,650

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rail Link (Belfast to Dundonald)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has for the provision of a rail link from (a) Belfast to Dundonald and (b) Dundonald to Comber; what proposals there are for selling the former tracks of the Dundonald to Comber railway line; and if he will make a statement on the improvement of transport connections between Belfast and Comber.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company is about to commission Queen's university and the University of Ulster to undertake a "Comprehensive Appraisal of Alternative Urban Transport Technologies for Belfast". This will include an investigation into the application of light rapid transit to Belfast and surrounding areas. There are no proposals to improve transport connections between Dundonald and Comber. Part of the track between Ballyloughran and Ballyrainey is currently on offer for sale.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons are employed by the Northern Ireland Assembly at Parliament Buildings, Stormont; what is the annual expenditure of the Northern Ireland Assembly; and if he will make a statement about the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mr. Cope: Eleven, including one part-time. The Northern Ireland Assembly cost £318,000 last year and £341,000 has been allocated for 1989-90. This figure includes £97,000 granted for deficiency contributions to pension funds of the Assembly and former House of Commons. The salary of the Clerk is (under section 24(6) of the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973) charged to the Consolidated Fund.

It continues to be the Government's policy to encourage progress towards devolution. Pending the resumption of such a role by elected representatives, staff of the Northern Ireland Assembly, which was dissolved on 23 June 1986, continue to perform residual functions.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many members of the Ulster Defence Regiment were arrested on Sunday 8 October; how many members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary were involved in this operation; what is the estimated cost of the Royal Ulster Constabulary participation in this operation; if the authorities in the Republic of Ireland were given advance notice of this operation; how many of the arrested Ulster Defence Regiment men were subsequently charged with offences; how many of the arrested Ulster Defence Regiment men were remanded in custody; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 17 October 1989]: All police operations in the Province are the responsibility of the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and he has informed me that 28 members of the UDR were arrested on Sunday 8 October. The police operation involved 334 RUC officers and cost an estimated £45,000. Six UDR soldiers have been charged with criminal offences and all were initially remanded in custody; four have now been released on bail by the High Court. No advance notice was given of the operation to the authorities in the Republic of Ireland.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Republic of Ireland (Extradition)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Attorney-General how many applications to the Republic of Ireland for the extradition of persons in connection with alleged terrorist crimes have been successful since 15 November 1985.

The Attorney-General: A total of three persons whose return was sought in connection with alleged terrorist crimes have been returned to the United Kingdom since 15 November 1985.

Father Patrick Ryan

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Attorney-General when the initial application for the extradition of Father Patrick Ryan was lodged with the authorities in the Republic of Ireland; if he can report progress; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to my reply to a private notice question from the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) on 14 December 1988. The decision of the Irish Attorney-General on 12 December 1988 effectively precludes any further attempt to seek an order for Patrick Ryan's return from the Republic of Ireland.

Croydon Court Centre

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Attorney-General what steps are being taken to improve the procedure for taxing bills at the Croydon combined court centre.

The Attorney-General: Arrears in the taxation of solicitors' bills in civil proceedings were identified in July 1989. Immediate steps were taken to rectify the position, including the provision of some additional registrar time and overtime for court staff. The arrears have now been substantially cleared.

County Courts (Midland and Oxford Circuit)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Attorney-General what, at each of the county courts on the Midland and Oxford circuit by name is the (a) shortest and (b) longest time currently being taken to obtain a hearing for possession of land actions; and what was the position one and two years earlier.

The Attorney-General [holding answer 20 October 1989]: The tables show the current position for possession hearings at each county court on the Midland and Oxford circuit. Apart from Birmingham county court, the present position is much as it was one and two years ago. At Birmingham the city council has substantially increased the number of possession actions in respect of rent arrears in recent months. Consideration is being given to ways of reducing the time taken to obtain a hearing at Birmingham county court.

PRIME MINISTER

Energy Conservation

Q7. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding energy conservation.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has received a number of representations regarding energy conservation and energy efficiency. Over the last four years for which figures are available the United Kingdom's ratio of energy use to GDP has increased at twice the EC average.

East Germany

Q19. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding human rights in East Germany.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has received a number of representations. There is widespread and justified concern in this country about human rights abuses in the German Democratic Republic.

USSR

Q27. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding United Kingdom relations with the USSR.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The Government receive many representations about Anglo-Soviet relations both from members of the public and from interested organisations. There is widespread support for our determination to strengthen these relations and to support perestroika. The Prime Minister emphasised this when she was in Moscow in September.

Environmental Policy

Q39. Mr. Malins: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding environmental policy.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister received a number of recent representations about the environment, stimulated by the pace of our initiatives on environmental protection.

Water Industry

Q83. Mr. Marland: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the water industry.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have received a wide range of representations, especially on the subject of privatisation, which in our view represents the best way of achieving even higher standards of water quality more quickly and more cost effectively.

Local Government (London)

Q92. Mr. Fishburn: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding local government in London.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister frequently receives representations about local government.

Hungary

Q106. Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding United Kingdom relations with Hungary.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

Our relations with Hungary are currently excellent. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is looking forward to meeting Hungarian State Minister Imre Pozsgay again on 27 October, and to the visit of Mr. Nemeth, the Hungarian Prime Minister in December. We welcome the many positive changes that are happening in Hungary. We have recently announced that we shall be establishing a fund to spend £25 million over five years to support progress towards democracy and a market economy in Hungary.

Poland

Q115. Mr. Page: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding United Kingdom relations with Poland.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

Our relations with Poland are excellent. We wish the new, Solidarity-led Government every success. It has made a courageous start. The Prime Minister had talks with General Jaruzelski and with Professor Geremek of Solidarity in June, and very much looks forward to meeting Mr. Walesa here soon. We are committed to a major international effort to support Polish economic reform and recovery based on an IMF programme. Bilaterally we are giving £25 million over five years to provide training in the political and economic skills Poland needs. For example, last week a group of Polish members of parliament was here to study how our own parliamentary system works. The European Community is sending food to Poland. 200 million ecus from next year's budget will concentrate on projects for agriculture, the environment and vocational training.

Llanfihangel-y-fedw

Q125. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make an official visit to the village of Llanfihangel-y-fedw in Newport, West.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has at present no plans to do so.

Nuclear Waste

Q130. Sir Hugh Rossi: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding nuclear waste disposal.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

Recently a number of representations have been received from Norwegian citizens and three have been received from United Kingdom residents about nuclear waste disposal.

Steel Industry

Q147. Mr. William Powell: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the British steel industry.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has received representations on this subject.

Cyprus

Q194. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding United Kingdom relations with Cyprus.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has received a number of such representations from various quarters. I am happy to say that our relations with Cyprus are excellent.

Economy

Q195. Mr. Cash: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the performance of the economy.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister regularly receives a large number of representations.

Federal Republic of Germany

Q209. Mr. John Butcher: To ask the Prime Minister if she has any plans to meet the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister expects to meet Chancellor Kohl at a meeting of European Community Heads of Government in Strasbourg on 8 and 9 December.

Lancashire

Mr. Jack: To ask the Prime Minister when she next proposes to visit Lancashire.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 October.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 October.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 October.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 October.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is returning from the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Kuala Lumpur.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Division Bells

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Lord President of the Council how frequently the tests of the Division bells reveal defects; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Defects in the Division Bell system are revealed only infrequently; this level of performance is achieved by the daily maintenance and inspection of the system which includes attention to areas of potential weakness.

Bills (Timetables)

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will produce a table showing for each Bill introduced in this Parliament the time taken at (a) Second Reading, (b) Committee stage, both in Standing Committee and on the Floor of the House of Commons, (c) Report stage, (d) Third Reading, (e) where applicable, time spent on the guillotined stages, (f) Lords amendments and (g) in total.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: A table showing the information requested for each Bill introduced in this Parliament could be provided only with disproportionate cost. The information for Government Bills introduced in this Session only, up to and including 18 October 1989, is given in the table. I would refer the hon. Member to the answer in Official Report of 3 November 1988, columns 717-720 for similar information relating to the 1987-88 Session.

Security Passes

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many Commons pass applications have been received during the summer recess in respect of overseas students working for Members; how many are still awaiting security clearance; what is the average time taken to process such applications.

Sir Geoffrey Howe [pursuant to his reply, 18 October 1989, c. 141]: Only one pass application received during the summer recess in respect of Members' temporary research assistants from overseas is now still awaiting clearance.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Under-fives

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list all submissions received by the committee on the education of under-fives; which of these have been circulated to all committee members; what criteria are used to determine which submissions will not be circulated; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The organisations and individuals listed in the table have submitted written evidence to the committee. Submissions from nationally representative organisations are circulated in full to members, assessors and observers as a matter of course. In the interests of efficiency other submissions are not automatically given full circulation but members receive salient details and may request copies of any item.

Overseas Teachers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list by local education authority the number of overseas teachers who have taken up posts since the beginning of the current school year and the countries from which they come.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information is not available in the form requested. During the month of September, 323 teachers trained outside the United Kingdom have been considered for qualified teacher status by the Department. Of these, 153 have been accorded status. The country in which their qualifications were obtained are as follows:

Teacher Shortages (South Yorkshire)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the current figures of teacher shortages in south Yorkshire by (a) local education authority and (b) subject.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Numbers of vacancies in January 1989 for full-time permanent teachers in nursery, primary and secondary schools maintained by the four local education authorities in South Yorkshire are shown in the table.

Institute of Food Research

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will state the number of scientific officers being made redundant or eligible for early retirement from the Institute of Food Research, Bristol, together with the numbers of such officers being transferred to each of other named institutions.

Mr. Jackson: This information is not available. It will not be known until the level of funding beyond 1990-91 for the AFRC Institute of Food Research, of which the Bristol laboratory is part, is known; the consequences in terms of identifying surplus posts and carrying out the redundancy procedures of the Council have been completed; and discussions with third parties concluded.

Student Loans (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the implications of student loans for Northern Ireland students.

Mr. Jackson: Students ordinarily resident in Northern Ireland attending full-time higher education courses in Great Britain will be eligible for top-up loans, as will students ordinarily resident in England, Scotland or Wales attending courses in Northern Ireland.

Teachers' Pay

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will allow the interim advisory committee freedom to determine pay levels in the teaching profession by removing restrictions arising from cash limits.

Mrs. Rumbold: No.

Teacher Training

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much central Government have contributed to the local education authority training grants scheme in each of the past five years; how much they plan to contribute up to 1991-92; and if he will make a statement on the trend in the central Government contribution in percentage terms.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The table shows how much money the Government have made available through the scheme, and how much expenditure this has supported, for each financial year since the scheme began:

England and Wales, (£000s)

Year	Total expenditure supported	Total government grant allocated	Per cent
1987-88	205,360	108,510	53·0
1988-89	218,937	125,700	57·0
1989-90	227,380	131,640	58·0
1990-91	229,090	134,165	59·0
1991-92	[1]—	—

[1] Not yet determined.

Under the former in-service teacher training grants scheme, which this scheme replaced, a further £17·27 million was made available in 1985-86 and £20·74 million in 1986-87 to support in-service training.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much is currently spent on in-service training for teachers; and if he will also express this figure as a percentage proportion of the total teachers' salaries bill.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Local education authorities in England have indicated that they are planning to spend £289 million on the in-service training of teachers in 1989-90. This represents about 4 per cent. of the total teachers salary bill for that year. Support for in-service training is also available through the Universities Funding Council, the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council, the Open University, the National Curriculum Council and other agencies.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to set up a national advisory body for in-service training and teachers.

Mr. Alan Howarth: None.

Assisted Places

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much is currently spent on the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Provision for expenditure on the assisted places scheme in England for the financial year 1989-90 is £59,049,000.

Student Accommodation

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students in institutions of higher education are currently residing in sub-standard or unsatisfactory accommodation.

Mr. Jackson: Information about sub-standard or unsatisfactory accommodation is not held centrally. Student accommodation is the responsibility of institutions.

Mandatory Grants

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to reduce the residential qualification for mandatory grants especially in cases where applicants wish to take courses necessary in obtaining a teaching qualification.

Mr. Jackson: No.

SCOTLAND

Housing

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing central Government support per house in each district council area in each year in the period 1977-78 to 1988-89.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: If the hon. Member could be more specific about the information he is seeking, I shall try to provide it.

Loan Charges

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the annual total loan charges payable by the four city district councils in each of the past five years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information for the latest available years is as follows:

Loans charges paid

	1983-84 £ million	1984-85 £ million	1985-86 £ million	1986-87 £ million	1987-88 £ million
Aberdeen	25·1	28·9	29·6	28·5	32·6
Dundee	20·7	23·7	26·3	27·3	34·3
Edinburgh	35·4	41·6	41·0	42·2	45·8
Glasgow	126·1	142·1	155·7	160·6	167·9

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the effect of current interest rates on the loan charges facing Scottish local authorities in the present financial year.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Local authorities have budgeted for loan and leasing charges of £605 million on services relevant for revenue support grant in 1989-90. The latest available estimates—which do not take account of the most recent increase in interest rates—indicate that this figure may be £20 million higher as a result of interest rate changes. The majority of the loans taken out by local authorities are at fixed rates of interest. Therefore, loan charges depend to a large extent on the interest rate current when a loan was taken out, and fluctuations in interest rates have a lesser effect than would otherwise be the case.

Loan charges, budgeted to be met from housing revenue accounts, amount to £495 million for 1989-90 and the effect of increased interest rates is under consideration. If necessary, a housing support grant variation order will be made in due course.

Lithotriptor Centre

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average time a National Health Service patient would wait for first treatment at the Scottish lithotriptor centre.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Patients with severe symptoms requiring immediate treatment are treated immediately. Other urgent patients are treated within three to four weeks. Patients whose symptoms are less severe may have to wait up to one year for treatment although if their condition deteriorates their priority for treatment will be reassessed. Recent changes at the unit have enabled more patients to be treated each week. This should help to reduce waiting times.

Capital Debt

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the outstanding capital debt of Scottish local authorities; and what is the housing capital debt within the total.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The latest returns available show that at 31 March 1988, the total outstanding capital debt of Scottish local authorities was £8 billion, of which £4·4 billion was housing capital debt.

Bracken

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what research his Department has conducted into the possible link between inhalation of spores from bracken fern and cancer; if he will publish the results; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Department is not directly involved in such research. However research work has been carried out for a number of years at the Royal Botanic Garden, Edinburgh, on the biology of bracken, including the periodicity of spore release, and its control. Work on bracken control and on monitoring its distribution in Scotland has been carried out by the Macaulay land use research institute.

Untreated Sewage

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations have been received regarding the disposal of untreated domestic sewage at sea off the west coast of Scotland; what steps his Department intends to take to prevent this from happening; and what provision is made by regional councils for the disposal of septic tank wastes.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: From time to time specific representations are received about discharges of sewage at particular sites off the west coast of Scotland.

Responsibility for discharges from public sewerage systems and outfalls lies with the regional or islands council concerned. All discharges to the sea of sewage effluent require the consent of the local river purification authority who can set conditions which may include the volume and quality of the discharges. Failure to comply with consent conditions may result in prosecution.

Most regional and island councils collect and dispose of septic tank wastes as part of their overall sewage disposal operation. In many areas septic tank waste is dealt with at local sewage treatment works. In other cases disposal to land or to sea may provide the best practicable environmental option.

Dyslexia

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many sufferers of dyslexia were assessed as registered disabled persons and had their names entered on the registered disabled persons' register in each of the past seven years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: Information on the number of persons in particular categories of disability is not collected centrally. Local authorities are required to inform themselves of the numbers of chronically sick and disabled persons within their areas. They are not, however, required to keep registers for the purpose.

Historic Monuments

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the sums spent on (a) preservation of monuments in care, (b) archaeology and (c) assisting with the repair of historic buildings in (i) Scotland, (ii) Shetland and (iii) Orkney in each financial year since 1983-84.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The sums spent are in the table.

£000s

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89
(a) Presentation of monuments in care
(i) Scotland	286	624	771	1,150	968	2,027
(ii) Shetland	—	—	—	35	16	7
(iii) Orkney	—	—	—	—	6	40
(b) Rescue Archaeology and Archaeology at monuments in care
(i) Scotland	698	745	781	866	1,006	1,138
(ii) Shetland	12	1	—	3	5	7
(iii) Orkney	118	136	137	147	133	13
(c) Historic Building Repair Grant
(i) Scotland	2,734	2,618	3,871	3,651	5,443	6,474
(ii) Shetland	1	—	—	14	—	2
(iii) Orkney	34	16	28	77	38	76

Note: 1. The Scotland figure for 1988-89 under (a) includes £1·370 million at Edinburgh Castle.
2. Rescue archaeology predominates in (b), and expenditure is incurred in response to threats to sites from development or natural causes such as erosion.
3. Expenditure on historic building repair grant arises from application by owners.

Forestry

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will review the criteria for the release of agricultural land for forestry planting in Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: Since I announced revised criteria for forestry planting on agricultural land in Scotland on 24 March 1986, there have been a number of significant developments affecting forestry and agriculture. In particular, the Government have introduced a number of new initiatives to encourage planting on better quality land as well as increasing the overall planting target to 33,000 hectares a year for new forestry planting, with an additional 12,000 hectares a year for planting under the farm woodland scheme. It is clear that there will continue to be considerable interest in new forestry planting in Scotland. I have, therefore, considered changes which might be made to the criteria for the release of agricultural land to facilitate this achievement of the type and level of planting for which we are aiming while preserving an acceptable balance with agriculture, the environment and other interests. I have also taken the opportunity to simplify the criteria. In bringing forward these proposals I have consulted both the Countryside Commission for Scotland and the Nature Conservancy Council.

There is a continuing need to retain in agriculture prime quality land, which is in general too scarce and important a resource in Scotland to be put to any other use, and to protect the land necessary to maintain a thriving hill sheep farming industry to underpin the economy of the hill areas. In the present situation, however, there is not generally so pressing a need to preserve other land for agricultural use and I am in particular willing in appropriate circumstances to support the release for forestry planting of non-prime arable land—that is, land falling within classes 3.2 and 4 of the land capability classification for agriculture—where such planting could play an important part in reducing agricultural surpluses, and bring significant environmental benefits.

Applications under the Forestry Commission's woodland grant scheme and the commission's own proposed land acquisitions will continue to be considered on their merits through the usual procedures for consultation between the commission and other interested authorities. To simplify the criteria for the release of agricultural land for forestry planting, a single threshold of 40 hectares has been set for consultation with my Department. Consultation will not be required for planting applications in respect of areas of land falling below this threshold except in the following cases:

applications relating to prime quality agricultural land, for that is, land falling within classes 1, 2 and 3·1 of the land capability classification for agriculture, and to specifically identified areas where the scope for afforestation has to be severely constrained to ensure that the hill sheep industry continues to thrive. In these cases my Department will apply a general presumption against release of the land for forestry planting. Separate applications for areas of land of less than 40 hectares submitted either simultaneously or consecutively and relating to the same agricultural unit, which together exceed 40 hectares. Applications relating to areas of land in respect of which agricultural grant has been paid within the previous two years where consultation is necessary to ensure that there is no conflict between the requirements of the relevant agricultural grant scheme and the planting proposals. For the same reason consultation will also be necessary in relation to land which is the subject of a conservation agreement under the environmentally sensitive area scheme (ESA). The Forestry Commission will continue generally to take account of the special status of ESAs in considering applications within the designated areas.

The requirement for consultation on all applications in these categories does not, however, necessarily imply that objections to the planting proposals involved will be raised on agricultural grounds. There will otherwise be a general presumption in favour of the release of agricultural land for forestry planting. This means that the Department will have to demonstrate that the presumption in favour of release should not apply in any particular case where a planting proposal is regarded as being unacceptable on agricultural grounds, for instance because release of the land involved would undermine the agricultural structure of the area.

A map, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House, is being made available to interested parties showing the areas of hill sheep land and of prime quality agricultural land where a general presumption against release for forestry planting will apply; the map also shows the boundaries of the Scottish ESAs. The location of the prime quality agricultural land in Scotland can be found in greater detail, in maps produced by the Macaulay land use research institute.

I have also taken the opportunity to revise the procedures for carrying out assessments of planting proposals to reduce the time taken to deal with applications.

I hope that these changes in criteria and procedures will result in a better understanding of the circumstances in which agricultural land will be released for forestry planting and will help to promote an increase in the levels of new planting in areas where this can be accommodated without detriment to, and in many cases with positive benefit for, the environment.

Procurator Fiscal

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of reports submitted by the police and other reporting agencies to the procurator fiscal were marked "no proceedings" in the fiscaldom of (a) Wick and (b) Dornach for the whole of 1987 and 1988.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 23 October 1989]: The proportion of reports submitted by the police and other reporting agencies to the procurator fiscal of Wick and Dornach which were marked "no proceedings" for the whole of 1987 and 1988 were 18 per cent. and 17 per cent. and 11 per cent. and 7 per cent. respectively.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Political Groups (EC)

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will tabulate in the Official Report, the amounts paid, in 1988 pound sterling equivalents, to each of the political groups of the European Parliament, together with an indication of any allocated expenditure within the totals and the total expected expenditure in 1990.

Mr. Maude: The information requested for 1988 is not immediately available, but a reply will be given as soon as possible.

The EC budget for 1990, and hence the European Parliament provision, cannot be adopted before the December plenary session of the European Parliament.

Border Controls

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to monitor the work of the Schengen group of European Community countries in its planning for the abolition of border controls; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: We are naturally interested in the experience of the Schengen partners in seeking to reduce frontier controls. We are monitoring progress closely through contacts with the member states concerned. I understand that they are unlikely to meet the 1990 deadline for abolishing land frontiers between them.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why Her Majesty's Government are not participating in the Schengen group's work on European Community border controls.

Mr. Maude: The Schengen agreement is an arrangement between France, the Federal Republic and the Benelux countries. Their work is entirely separate from the wider discussions on free movement of people which are taking place among all member states of the European Community, in which the United Kingdom participates fully and actively.

Ukraine

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to establish a British embassy in the Ukraine; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. The British embassy in Moscow handles all work relating to British interests in the Ukraine.

Punjab

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Indian Government about the continuing troubles in the Punjab.

Mr. Sainsbury: None. We co-operate closely with the Government of India in the fight against a violent challenge to the rule of law from ruthless terrorists. We have no sympathy with people who use violence to threaten India's unity and cohesion.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have protested to the Indian Government over human rights abuses in the Punjab.

Mr. Sainsbury: No. We have always made clear our views on the need for all Governments to respect human rights. For their part, the Indian Government have recently reaffirmed their resolve to take action where there are abuses of human rights in Punjab.

Hong Kong

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what deputations and representations have been received from Hong Kong during the summer adjournment on the issue of the right of abode.

Mr. Maude: We have received numerous representations on this subject from people in Hong Kong and from others with a close interest in Hong Kong. For example, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs had a very useful discussion on this and other current Hong Kong issues with a delegation from OMELCO in the margins of the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Kuala Lumpur.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans the Government have to further extend the number of full British passport holders in Hong Kong.

Mr. Maude: We are working on a scheme to give the assurance of right of abode in the United Kingdom to people in the private and public sectors, whose skills are essential to the continued prosperity of Hong Kong. Our aim is to give such people the confidence to remain in the territory. No decision has yet been taken on what form these assurances should take.

EC (Moslem Population)

Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what information he has on the size of the Moslem population and the country of origin in each of the member states of the European Economic Community;

(2) what information he has on the number of the Moslem population and their country of origin in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales, (d) Northern Ireland, (e) the Channel Islands, (f) each of the county towns of England, Wales and Northern Ireland and (g) each of the towns containing the regional or islands councils in Scotland.

Mr. Hurd: I have been asked to reply.

Official data on persons' religions are not available, but an unofficial estimate of the number of active members of the Moslem religion in the whole of the United Kingdom is given in table 11.8 of the Central Statistical Office publication "Social Trends 19".

ENVIRONMENT

Seals

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy of 28 July, Official Report, column 117, on seal deaths, he will publish that letter to which reference is made in the Official Report.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I wrote to the hon. Member on 23 August. A copy of the letter has been placed in the Library of the House.

London Docklands

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much the London Docklands Development Corporation is spending on social housing and community facilities in the current year in the London Borough of Newham; and what are the future plans.

Mr. Moynihan: LDDC's programme includes £24 million of expenditure on social housing and community projects specific to Newham in the current year, in addition to expenditure on various Docklandswide initiatives which will also benefit this area.

Future plans will be decided in the light of the Department's expenditure plans for 1990-91 to 1992-93 which will be announced by the Secretary of State at the time of the autumn statement.

333 Whapload Road, Lowestoft

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the appeal against refusal by Waveney distict council to demolish listed building 333 Whapload road, Lowestoft, Ref.: APP/T3535/89/804854 and Ref.: APP/T3535/A/89/130250 will be dealt with by written representation or public inquiry; why his Department has announced both methods for determination; and whether he will assist the appellant financially on his second appeal for the same building.

Mr. Moynihan: Although the appeals in question were originally to be dealt with by an exchange of written representations, the submissions made indicated that a public local inquiry was necessary in order to inform the inspector of all the relevant issues. This change in procedure does not make a further appeal necessary.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received a copy of the report on the movement and management of toxic waste approved by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe; and if he will make it his policy that the United Kingdom complies fully with the recommendations made in this report.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have seen the provisional edition of the recommendations on transfrontier movement of toxic waste by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. The United Kingdom, by signing the Basel convention on transboundary movements of hazardous waste and working within the European Community for its ratification and implementation, intends to comply with the recommendations.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take in response to the loss of wildlife habitat and the damage or destruction of sites of special scientific interest; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and the guidance given in the Department's circular 27/87 "Nature Conservation" ensures that planning authorities are able to take full account of the nature conservation interest of land which is the subject of development proposals. It is the responsibility of planning authorities to consider these interests together with the requirements of other legitimate land uses in reaching their decisions. A high proportion of damage is the incidental result of third party activities. We are ready to consider, with the NCC and others, practicable action to minimise them. Damage to SSSIs from agricultural operations is now a tiny proportion of the total.

Wath Recycling Company

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to when the toxic waste received by the Wath Recycling Company from the United States of America is to be moved from Wath upon Dearne and what information he has as to the intended destination.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department has no information as to when the waste imported from the United States of America to Wath Recycling Ltd. will be moved from Wath upon Dearne nor as to its destination.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he expects to take criminal action against any party involved in the importation of contaminated waste by the Wath Recycling Company.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The question as to whether criminal legal proceedings should be taken concerning the importation of waste by Wath Recycling Ltd. is a matter for Rotherham metropolitan borough council, the appropriate waste disposal authority, to decide.

City Grant

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation giving powers to local authorities to conduct a referendum on any proposed development which is subject to an application for city grant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: No.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria are applied when assessing a company which is making an application for city grant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The criteria applied in appraisal of an application for city grant are described in the city grant guidance notes. The appraisal process seeks to establish that the private sector participant has the necessary financial strength and expertise to carry out the project, and whether any external finance needed is in place.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether planning consent is required for any development before city grant is made; what is the general level of city grant as a proportion of total anticipated expenditure; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what safeguards exist to prevent local authorities from being prejudiced in dealing with planning applications which are subject to city grant requests by accepting plans on the basis that the grant will be made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: City grant applications are not accepted for appraisal unless planning permission for the project has already been granted, or is due to be considered shortly by the local planning authority. As a decision on city grant is not made until there is a final determination of planning permission, the local authority, in considering planning applications is not in a position to accept them on the basis that grant will be given.

On average, approximately £1 of city grant levies is £4 of private sector investment.

Bradford IDO

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether a full application has yet been received from Bradford for the rebuilding and diversion of Bradford beck under the Bradford integrated development operation; whether the application has been considered by the IDO co-ordinating committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: A full application incorporating elements from the Yorkshire water authority has been received from Bradford metropolitan borough council for the rebuilding and diversion of Bradford beck under the Bradford integrated development operation. This application requires to be supported by a cost benefit analysis, which is awaited. When this is received and properly evaluated, the application will be submitted to the IDO co-ordinating committee.

Genetically Altered Organisms

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if it is his intention to allow public consultation under rules to specify legal procedures for the release outdoors of genetically altered organisms; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has had concerning the establishment of a safety directorate to oversee the application of safety rules to all research and production involving the use of genetically engineered organisms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Controls over the release of genetically engineered or manipulated organisms are administered principally by the Health and Safety Executive at present. Improvements in the existing controls to provide greater protection for the environment are being considered in the light of the 13th report of the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution and of comments received in response to the consultation paper "Proposals for Additional Legislation on the Intentional Release of Genetically Manipulated Organisms" which was published jointly by my Department and the Scotttish and Welsh Offices. This consideration includes the possible structure of any revised system of controls and the extent to which there should be public consultation on proposed releases, but no decisions have yet been taken.

Community Liaison Officers

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the urban development corporations who have appointed community liaison officers and the dates of any such appointments.

Mr. Moynihan: The following urban development corporations have an officer or officers carrying out community liaison work, with the date of the first such appointment in brackets:

Black Country Development Corporation (October 1987);
Central Manchester Development Corporation (1 December 1988);
London Docklands Development Corporation (10 January 1983);
Sheffield Development Corporation (12 December 1988);
Trafford Park Development Corporation (27 February 1989);
Tyne and Wear Development Corporation (20 October 1988 as a consultant).

The Teesside development corporation has an officer whose duties include community liaison work.

Teesdale

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State of the Environment what is the total amount of money spent so far by the Teesside urban development corporation on the purchase and reclamation of the Teesdale site in Stockton-on-Tees; how much is budgeted for future expenditure on this site; how much has been spent by other public agencies; what resources are being provided for creating an access to the site; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The Teesside development corporation has, to date, spent £5·7 million on the purchase and reclamation of the Teesdale site. I am not aware of any significant expenditure on this site by other public agencies.

The total cost for the acquisition, site preparation and infrastructure works for the Teesdale site is estimated at £57 million. This figure includes the cost of providing access to the site and the construction of the new bridges and barrage across the River Tees which are the subject of a private Bill promoted by the development corporation which is currently before Parliament.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals have been put forward from the private sector for the Teesdale site; when any development is likely to take place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: There is significant private sector interest in the development of the Teesdale site for commercial, industrial and housing uses. The Teesside development corporation must, however, await the progress of the River Tees Barrage and Bridges Private Bill before detailed proposals for the comprehensive development of the site can be finalised.

Social Housing (Docklands)

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what provisions are to be made by the Government to the London Docklands development corporation for the social housing programme for the years 1990-91 to 1992-93; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: This will be decided in the light of the Department's expenditure plans for 1990-91 to 1992-93 which will be announced by the Secretary of State at the time of the autumn statement.

Rural Development Commission

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the work of the Rural Development Commission, in particular regarding its programme of assisting balanced and viable local communities in the more remote regions of England.

Mr. Trippier: The annual report of the Rural Development Commission for 1988-89 has recently been published and copies have been placed in the Library. The Rural Development Commission is the principal agency in England charged with carrying forward the Government's policy of diversifying the rural economy. Its programmes for that purpose make a major contribution to maintaining balanced and viable communities in rural areas, and it also assists that objective by measures to increase the supply of affordable housing in rural areas and by helping community groups and community development projects. The bulk of the Commission's expenditure is targeted towards its priority areas, the rural development areas, which are mostly in the more remote regions of England.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether there are any plans to increase the measures available to the Rural Development Commission for promoting community development.

Mr. Trippier: The Rural Development Commission has already increased the proportion of its funds devoted to community development and self-help. It is now planning to launch a new fund targeted on the problems of disadvantaged groups in rural areas.

Sewerage Works

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to determine the applications for time-limited consents in respect of certain sewage treatment works submitted to him in response to his announcement on 7 December 1988 of an accelerated investment programme designed to improve effluent quality.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has today issued the first directions to the National Rivers Authority to grant time-limited consents in respect of a number of applications for sewage treatment works. Further directions, including where relevant refusals of applications, will be issued as the individual applications are considered. All those who submitted representations on individual applications will be notified of my right hon. Friend's decision together with the reasons for it in due course. It will be for the National Rivers Authority to place these consents on the public register in the usual way.

Ocean Circulation Experiment

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, if he will make a statement on the plan for and purpose of the world ocean circulation experiment based at the Institute of Oceanographic Sciences at Deacon laboratory in Wormley, Surrey.

Mr. Jackson: I have been asked to reply.

The World Ocean Circulation Experiment (WOCE) is an international experiment which will study the role of ocean circulation in determing climate change. The United Kingdom has played a major role in the planning of WOCE and will contribute both to the data collection and the development of models of ocean circulation. WOCE will take place mainly between 1990 and 1996 and in the United Kingdom will involve the Natural Environment Research Council (NERC), higher education institutions, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and the Meteorological Office.

Water Privatisation

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to announce the K factors to be given to the statutory water companies.

Mr. Chris Patten [holding answer 19 October 1989]: I plan to announce before the end of December the K values which I propose to determine in respect of statutory water companies.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each water company region the number of members of the public who have registered an interest in purchasing shares in the water industry.

Mr. Chris Patten [holding answer 19 October 1989]: No. The prospectus will contain all information on registration that is material to investors' decisions.

Algae

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on algae blooms both in Britain's reservoirs and lakes and in estuaries and around the coastline.

Mr. Chris Patten [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Algal blooms are normal in United Kingdom surface waters. In the particular cases of toxic blue-green algae in reservoirs this summer it has been prudent for owners to prohibit public access for recreational uses. The incidence of blue-green algae is now declining. The National Rivers Authority is monitoring the situation closely.

Committee Statistics

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the composition of each customer services committee, showing for each member their age, sex and background leading to their being appointed to the committee and which interests they represent.

Mr. Chris Patten [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Appointments to the customer service committees for the water industry are a matter for the Director General of Water Services. I understand that the Director General is currently considering nominations received from a large number of interest groups and that he hopes to announce the membership of the committees in the near future.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings and on what dates have been held between his departmental officials, representatives of 3Ds Ltd. and officials of Bradford local authority; what advice was given to both bodies by his officials regarding any application for city grant for the West End development in Bradford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Members of the Department's team of professional appraisers and other officials have had many discussions on the proposals for the West End development, with representatives of 3D Ltd., and officials from the local authority, at both the regional office and headquarters. Details of the precise dates are not readily available.

Advice given to the developers and local authorities regarding any application for city grant is the standard guidance contained in the city grant guidance notes. For reasons of commercial confidentiality it is not our practice to comment on individual city grant proposals.

HEALTH

Rabies

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people died from rabies in the United Kingdom in each of the past five years; and what were the comparable figures in each of the other European Community countries.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested for the United Kingdom is show in the table; data for other European Community countries are not available.

Disease Control

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in implementing the recommendation of the chief medical officer's report "Public Health in England" that the Public Health (Control of Disease) Act 1984 should be reviewed.

Mr. Freeman: As a first step in the review process a consultation document inviting comments on an extensive range of options and proposals to amend the law on infectious disease control is today being issued to a wide variety of health and local authority bodies. Copies have been placed in the Library. The closing date for replies will be 31 January 1990.

This is the first full review of infectious disease control since before the second world war. Many of the provisions in the current legislation date back to the late 19th and early 20th century. Our aim is to bring up to date the law relating to infectious diseases so that it reflects our current modern situation.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health why new core grants awarded to voluntary organisations under the provisions of section 64 of the Health Service and Public Health Act 1968 will be limited from the next financial year to a period which will not exceed five years.

Mr. Freeman: The primary objective of this change in relation to new grants is to ensure that the section 64 budget retains enough flexibility to encompass a range of new applications each year. The overall value of the section 64 budget has not been reduced, and we shall keep the outcome of this change under review.

Community Treatment Orders

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been conducted in the United Kingdom on the justification for community treatment orders; whether any such research is under consideration; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: We have just received the preliminary results of research commissioned by the Department of Health from Dr. Tom Sensky of Riverside health authority, London which examined the need for a community treatment order. I am not aware of any further research under consideration at present.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to publish his proposals for the introduction of community treatment orders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: We understand that in due course, the Royal College of Psychiatrists will be giving us their views on the possible role of new legal powers to ensure compulsory treatment in the community. We will then explore this issue with all the interested parties involved. Without prejudicing the discussion, we would need to be very clear both of the benefits, and that they could not be achieved through voluntary means, before seriously considering asking Parliament to create provision for compulsory treatment in the community.

Operations

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the cost of the 10 most commonly performed operations in the National Health Service in the 10 highest cost and 10 lowest cost districts for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Freeman: I regret that this information is not collected centrally and to do so would be at disproportionate cost.

Health Service Statistics

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will provide the following information for the latest year for which statistics are available together with figures for 1979 and the period 1974 to 1979: (a) the number of general practitioners, (b) general practitioners' list sizes, (c) the number of nurses, (d) the number of in-patients treated, (e) the number of out-patients treated, (f) the number of junior hospital doctors, (g) the number of consultants and (h) the total spending on the National Health Service.

Mr. Freeman: The information for England is as follows:

	1974	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1988
(a) Number of General Practitioners	20,219	20,377	20,551	20,796	21,040	21,357	25,322

Babies (Special Care)

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state for each regional health authority (a) in 1983 and (b) the latest figures available (i) the number of live births, (ii) the number of births of babies less than 1,000 grams, (iii) the number of special care baby cots and (iv) the number of babies under 1,000 grams per special care baby cot.

Mr. Freeman: The figures are shown in the tables.

TRANSPORT

Central London Rail Study

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the central London rail study.

Mr. Portillo: We are currently considering the proposals put forward in the central London rail study. Decisions will be announced shortly.

A46

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to uprate to motorway standard the A46 where it bypasses Kenilworth in Warwickshire.

Mr. Atkins: No.

Transport Act 1985 (Review)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will order a review of the working of the Transport Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: I have no plans to review the working of the Transport Act 1985. Bus deregulation has encouraged a greater diversity of services, with more bus miles being provided by more operators at lower cost to local authorities.

Roads White Paper

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from bodies located in the north-west of England on his roads White Paper.

Mr. Atkins: A number of representations, both from individuals and bodies, on the White Paper "Roads for Prosperity" published in May have been received from the north-west of England. Many of these have been concerned with particular schemes added to the national road programme by the White Paper and with the letting of design commissions.

Motorways

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on traffic volumes on the A419/A417 link between the M4 and the M5 in the last five years.

Mr. Atkins: Traffic flows on the A417/A419 route have been recorded as follows:

Stratton St. Margaret—north of Swindon

	Vehicles per day
1984	17,234
1985	18,845
1986	19,671
1987	22,156

1989	27,009

1984	9,813
1985	10,813

1989	12,558

Aircraft (Aborted Take-offs)

Mr. Lambie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many aborted take-offs of twin-engine aircraft have taken place in 1988 and 1989 at (a) United Kingdom and (b) Scottish airports.

Mr. McLoughlin: The overwhelming majority of aborted take-offs occur soon after the engines should reach full thrust; the aircraft's speed is less than 50 mph and there is more than a mile of runway remaining in which the aircraft can be safely stopped.

Aborted take-offs are required to be reported only if they occur near the speed where the pilot has to decide quickly whether to stop or continue the take-off. The numbers of such aborts by twin-engine aircraft were 24 in 1988, of which eight were in Scotland, and 19 so far in 1989, of which six were in Scotland.

Airports (Costs)

Mr. Lambie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will set out all expenditures deriving from governmental and public sector sources at the following airports from the creation of the BAA in 1966 to its privatisation: (a) Gatwick, (b) Heathrow, (c) Stansted, (d) Edinburgh, (e) Glasgow, (f) Aberdeen and (g) Prestwick;

(2) if he will set out all expenditures deriving from governmental and public sector sources in the road and rail infrastructure serving the following airports from the creation of the BAA in 1966 until its privatisation: (a) Gatwick, (b) Heathrow, (c) Stansted, (d) Edinburgh, (e) Glasgow, (f) Aberdeen and (g) Prestwick.

Mr. McLoughlin: This information is not held centrally.

Trunk Roads

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will reconsider the decision not to accept the need for a link road from Elkesley village to the B6387 in Nottinghamshire in the light of the increasingly motorway character of the A1 trunk road and the recent announcements of major sums available for improvements in trunk road/motorway provision; whether he has made any estimate of the cost of building this road; and what representations he has received on the issue.

Mr. Atkins: The provision of a link road is a matter for Nottinghamshire county council, as highway authority for the B6387.

The Department's White Paper "Roads for Prosperity", published in May, announced a study of the strategic needs of the A1 corridor from Stamford to south of Doncaster including possible motorway status. Junctions and accesses, including those at Elkesley, will be considered. It is hoped to appoint consultants soon.

Representations have been received from my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander), Bassetlaw district council and the Elkesley Bridge action group.

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current position regarding the proposed A38 trunk road improvements between Saltash and Trerulefoot and Liskeard-Bodmin; when he hopes to announce the preferred lines of route; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Consultants were appointed in October 1987 to investigate options for the proposed improvement of the A38 from Liskeard to Bodmin. We plan to carry out public consultation on alternative routes next year and to announce a preferred route early in 1991.

We expect to appoint consultants for the scheme from Saltash to Trerulefoot very shortly. One of their first tasks will be to review the earlier work done for this scheme; subject to the outcome of this we hope to carry out public consultation and announce a preferred route during 1992.

Manchester Metrolink

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce his decision on funding for the Manchester Metrolink project.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am today writing to Councillor Harkin, chairman of the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority, to say that I am approving phase I of the Manchester Metrolink project for grant under section 56 of the Transport Act 1968. Grant will be paid at 50 per cent. of eligible costs within a cash ceiling; borrowing approval will be available for other eligible costs.

I welcome this important and innovatory scheme, which is the first new street-running light railway in this country to be approved for many years. It will link Manchester's main railway termini, and will provide much-improved services to Bury and Altrincham. The scheme will also bring a new form of private sector involvement: it is to be designed, built, operated and maintained by a single consortium, the GMA Group. The net capital cost is expected to be about £110 million.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Fund

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what statistical information he has as to the reasons given to applicants by social fund officers at the local offices in Leicester for the nil awards in respect of an application for community care grant.

Mr. Scott: Information on the number of times each reason for decision has been used in refusing an application for a community care grant is given in the table.

Table: Numbers of each reason given for refusing a community care grant—period 4 April to 30 September 1989

Nursing Home Fees

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any plans to review the maximum levels of private nursing home fees funded by his Department; and if he has assessed whether existing levels are still relevant in the Bristol area.

Mrs. Gillian Shepard: The Government are currently reviewing all the limits and a general uprating statement will be made shortly in the usual way.

Overpayments

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide the most recent figures broken down by (a) year and (b) section on (i) the number of overpayments recovered under section 53 of the Social Security Act 1986, section 119 of the Social Security Act 1975 and section 20 of the Supplementary Benefit Act 1976, (ii) the number of standard letters sent indicating that recovery of overpayments through civil proceedings and (iii) the number of cases pursued under (ii) which are successful.

Mrs. Gillian Shepard: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 10 May 1989 at column 447.

Funeral Grant

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide payment of funeral grant in cases where a person dies in the United Kingdom but the body is buried elsewhere to cover all the costs incurred in the United Kingdom with the exception of air transit costs provided that the applicant would qualify in all other respects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: No. The Social Fund Maternity and Funeral Expenses (General) Regulations 1987 stipulate that a social fund funeral payment can be made for funeral expenses only where the burial or cremation takes place in the United Kingdom.

EMPLOYMENT

Wages Councils

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has come to a decision about the future of wages councils.

Mr. Nicholls: No.

Southern Tourist Board

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the top 20 tourist attractions in the area covered by the Southern tourist board in numbers visiting; and if he will indicate the numbers in each instance for the previous comparable year.

Mr. Nicholls: The Englisn tourist board's annual survey of visits to attractions gives the following figures for the Southern tourist board area in 1987 and 1988:

	Number of visits

Bridging Allowances

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons aged 16 and 17 years were in receipt of bridging allowance by region during April, May and June.

Mr. Nicholls: Figures for the number of young people in receipt of bridging allowance by region are provided in the table.

Numbers in receipt of Bridging Allowance

[1] The figures given relate to the Employment Department's Employment Service regions which do not equate to the Standard Economic Regions.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, by region, how many persons aged 16 and 17 years were in receipt of bridging allowance at the mid point of August, September and October.

Mr. Nicholls: Figures for the number of young people in receipt of bridging allowance by region for August and September are provided in the table. Figures for October are not yet available.

Numbers of receipt of bridging allowance

Child Care

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the Government's plans for work force child care.

Mr. Nicholls: The Government believe that child care is a matter for parental choice and that it is best left to employers and employees to decide which arrangements for combining work and family responsibilities best suit their individual needs and resources.

The Government take every opportunity to encourage employers to adopt flexible working practices, including assistance with child care and the introduction of flexible working hours and family leave.

Workplace nurseries are one possible way of helping parents with child care, but may not always be the most practicable solution. Other possibilities include help with child care costs in the local home area and rearrangement of working hours and holidays to fit in with school hours and terms.

The Government have also taken steps to encourage the growth of child care provision to assist working parents through the ministerial group on women's issues of which I am a member. The group recently announced a five-point plan designed to pave the way for the provision of child care to suit family needs. Work on this plan is progressing.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many men aged 45 to 65 years there are (a) in the United Kingdom, (b) in Scotland, (c) in full-time employment in the United Kingdom, (d) in full-time employment in Scotland, (e) in part-time employment in the United Kingdom, (f) in part-time employment in Scotland, (g) registered as unemployed in the United Kingdom and Scotland and (h) unemployed for one year, two years, three years and four or more years in the United Kingdom and Scotland;

(2) how many women aged 45 to 65 years there are (a) in the United Kingdom, (b) in Scotland, (c) in full-time employment in the United Kingdom, (d) in full-time employment in Scotland, (e) in part-time employment in the United Kingdom, (f) in part-time employment in Scotland, (g) registered as unemployed in the United Kingdom and Scotland and (h) unemployed for one year, two years, three years or four or more years in the United Kingdom and Scotland.

Mr. Nicholls: Estimates from the preliminary results of the 1988 labour force survey (LFS), of the number of men and women aged 45 to 64 years inclusive, as requested in (a) to (f) of the questions, are shown in table 1.

Table 1
Men and women aged 45-64 years inclusive—United Kingdom and Scotland
Spring 1988

unemployed over 52 weeks up to 104 weeks	46,113	5,686	18,755	2,494
unemployed over 104 weeks up to 156 weeks	33,257	3,863	11,243	1,492
unemployed over 156 weeks up to 208 weeks	27,805	3,245	9,468	1,166
unemployed over 208 weeks	105,722	14,191	30,001	3,574

[1] People claiming benefit at UBO's on the day of the monthly count, who on that day were unemployed and able and willing to do any suitable work.

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons in the Barnsley metropolitan district there were in (a) full-time employment, (b) part-time employment and (c) temporary employment for each year from 1979 (i) by gender and (ii) as a percentage of all employees in (x) manufacturing industry and (y) the service sector industry.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 20 October 1989]: The available employee estimates for the area are from the censuses of employment taken in September 1981, September 1984 and September 1987 and are given in the table.

[1] Excludes the self-employed and members of Her Majesty's Forces: employees in temporary employment are included but are not separately identified in the census; part-time workers are defined as those working not more than 30 hours a week.
[2] The district is defined in terms of ward boundaries as at 1981.
[3] Percentage of all industries and services total.

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report all parliamentary constituencies in which the number of people out of work and claiming benefit declined between August 1984 and August 1989 by 70 per cent. or more, giving (a) the percentage decline, (b) the numbers claiming such benefit in August 1984 and (c) the numbers claiming such benefit in August of the current year.

Mr. Nicholls: Between August 1984 and August 1989 the number of unemployed claimants fell by 70 per cent. or more in 13 parliamentary constituencies. The table lists the constituencies concerned showing the numbers of unemployed claimants in August 1984 and 1989 along with the percentage changes. The figures are affected by the change in the compilation of the count in March 1986 to reduce over-recording and by the change of coverage from September 1988 resulting from changes in benefit regulations affecting people aged under 18 years. Direct comparisons cannot therefore be made.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress is being made in establishing training and enterprise councils in the south-east; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I have been very encouraged by the excellent response from employers in the south-east and throughout the country since we issued the invitation to form training and enterprise councils (TECs).

Some 40 groups of senior employers from around the country have applied for development funding of which six are from employer groups in the south-east.

Unfair Dismissal

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any proposals to bring forward relating to mandatory reinstatement of those employees found to be unfairly dismissed.

Mr. Eggar: I have no such proposals.

YTS

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what further steps he proposes to take to assist those persons aged 16 and 17 years who are still unable to secure places on the YTS scheme because no suitable places are available.

Mr. Nicholls: Current arrangements to ensure that the Government's guarantee is delivered have achieved their objective. Any individual cases of difficulty should be brought to the attention of the Training Agency which will take whatever steps are necessary to provide a place suited to a young person's needs and abilities.

Restart

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment in the most recent 12-month period, how many claimants called for Restart interview have failed to attend their interview; how many of those failing to attend are believed to have found work; how many of those failing to attend have not found work; how many failing to attend have had their benefit stopped and how many of these have successfully appealed against the benefit decision; and how many failing to attend have subsequently re-registered as unemployed.

Mr. Eggar: Between August 1988 and August 1989 a total of 3,033,000 people were called in for Restart interview of which 316,400 were referred to unemployment benefit offices for failing to attend that interview. A total of 28,000 (8·8 per cent.) of these had their benefits or credits disallowed.

The other information requested is not available.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment why it was decided to exclude from the questionnaires to be completed by those attending Restart interviews any specific questions regarding any university degree or professional qualification which the interviewee may have.

Mr. Eggar: Question 4 of the employment interview form collects details of the most commonly held qualifications. It is limited in order to keep the form to a reasonable length. Question 5 contains a space which enables interviewees to insert any qualifications held which are not already included on the form that will help them in their search for work. Degree or professional qualifications can be shown in this space.

Employment Training

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the revised numbers of approved places allocated under employment training; what are the area budgets for the programme; and what are the allocations of supplementary grant, for each training agency area.

Mr. Nicholls: Up to 265,000 Employment Training (ET) places have been allocated for 1989-90. Following the annual round of recontracting, regions and areas are currently revising their detailed plans of numbers of places, of budgets, and of supplementary grants for ET in the light of these new contracts.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of those in the following Civil Service grades in his Department possess a formal professional management qualification: (a) members of the Health and Safety executive management board, (b) higher executive officers, (c) senior executive officers, (d) principals, (e) senior principals and (f) all grades above senior principal.

Mr. Eggar: Our records show that one of the 11 members of the Health and Safety Executive management board holds a professional management qualification. To supply the information regarding administration group grades for higher executive officer and above would entail disproportionate cost.

Hazardous Substances

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps are being taken to monitor and enforce the operation of the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive and local authorities will enforce the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations and monitor the implementation through their normal inspection arrangements. There will be an evaluation of the impact of the regulations in 1991.

Toxic Substances

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what toxic substances were contained in a shipment of copper hydroxide sludge received by Wath Recycling Company from the FMC Corporation of the United States of America; and to what health risks those (a) employed in this plant and (b) in the neighbouring communities were exposed.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The Health and Safety Executive's analysis of the copper hydroxide sludge showed that Xylene, 2, 3,—dihydro-2, 2—dimethyl benzofuran, and chlorinated phenolic compounds were present.

Xylene is a skin and eye irritant, which can affect the liver and cause loss of consciousness when concentrations are high. It is not a carcinogen. No documented toxicological data is available for 2, 3—Dihydro—2, 2—dimethyl benzofuran but related substances are known to be either carcinogenic to animals and possibly humans or toxic. Chlorinated phenolic compounds are toxic and possibly carcinogenic.

The Health and Safety Executive considered that whilst the bulk stack of sludge was left undisturbed there was unlikely to be any significant risk to people on or off site. This risk would increase during the process of repacking, but Health and Safety Executive inspectors ensured that suitable precautions were taken by both employees and the neighbouring communities.

DEFENCE

Department-Industry Links

17. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures his Department undertakes for staff interchanges with industry.

Mr. Alan Clark: We attach considerable importance to the benefits of staff interchages with industry and this is underscored by our very successful secondment programme which is the largest in the Civil Service—in 1988 we achieved our best ever total of 221 secondments to and from industry. Additionally, we have also recently established seven non-executive directorships for senior staff with non-defence related companies.

Low Flying

18. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his NATO allies concerning possible height restrictions on low flying.

22. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his NATO allies concerning possible height restrictions on low flying.

30. Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his NATO allies concerning possible height restrictions on low flying.

96. Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his NATO allies concerning possible height restrictions on low flying.

Mr. Neubert: My right hon. Friend has had discussions with those NATO allies involved about a package of measures designed to reduce the impact of low-flying training in the Federal Republic of Germany. The outcome of these discussions, which concerned among other subjects the height at which training was undertaken, was reported to the Bundestag by the Federal German Minister of Defence, Dr. Stoltenberg, on 29 September 1989 and a translation of this report has been placed in the Library.

87. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to amend the rules governing low-flying military activity in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neubert: There are no plans to alter the fundamental structure of the United Kingdom low-flying system which has worked well since its inception in 1979.

Frigates

19. Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress made in ordering the latest batch of type 23 frigates.

Mr. Neubert: We are currently evaluating and clarifying tenders received from Yarrow Shipbuilders Ltd., Swan Hunter Shipbuilders Ltd. and VSEL/Cammell Laird for the construction of up to four type 23 frigates. I would hope to announce the outcome of this competition by the end of the year.

NATO Secretary General

20. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next intends to meet the Secretary General of NATO; and what subjects he proposes to discuss with him.

Mr. Tom King: I hope to meet Dr. Woerner this evening at the nuclear planning group meeting in Portugal. We will discuss a range of matters concerning nuclear issues.

Troop Numbers

21. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effect on the British Army of the proposals tabled in Vienna for ceilings on troop numbers.

Mr. King: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney).

United States Defence Secretary

23. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met his United States counterpart; and what issues were discussed.

29. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met his United States counterpart; and what issues were discussed.

95. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met his United States counterpart; and what issues were discussed.

10. Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met his United States counterpart; and what issues were discussed.

Mr. Tom King: I hope to meet Mr. Cheney for the first time later today, at the meeting of the nuclear planning group in Portugal. We will be discussing a wide range of matters of mutual interest, both at the NPG and during Mr. Cheney's subsequent visit to the United Kingdom.

NATO (Southern Flank)

24. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions have taken place within NATO regarding its southern flank; and what proposals are currently being considered.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Matters affecting the southern flank are kept under constant review within NATO.

Defence Studies

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether non-provocative defence is studied at the service colleges.

46. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether non-provocative defence is studied at the service colleges.

38. Mr. Fishburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much time is allocated in the service colleges to defence studies.

25. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent NATO's strategy of flexible response is studied at the service colleges.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I assume that my hon. Friends are referring to the Royal College of Defence Studies, the Joint Service Defence College and the three single-service staff colleges. Their syllabuses are concerned with matters relating to defence, including the strategic political, economic and social factors that bear upon it. It is appropriate that considerable emphasis is placed upon study of the United Kingdom's and NATO's defence policies, including the strategy of flexible response which underpins those policies, but students are also given an insight into alternative policies and strategies. There is insufficient time, however, for the detailed study of specific alternatives such as so-called non-provocative defence.

Conventional Forces (Limitation)

26. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what part his Department is playing in the CFL negotiations.

33. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what part his Department is playing in the CFL negotiations.

76. Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what part his Department is playing in the conventional forces limitation negotiations.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence is playing a full part in the United Kingdom's contribution to the conventional armed forces in Europe talks now under way in Vienna.

Demography

27. Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest assessment of the effects of demographic changes upon Her Majesty's Government's defence policy.

65. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest assessment of the effects of demographic changes upon Her Majesty's Government's defence policy.

Mr. Neubert: I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) and for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths).

WE177 Bomb

28. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in his plans for modernising the Royal Air Force's WE177.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The studies into a number of options for the possible replacement of the WE177 free-fall bomb are continuing. It is not yet possible to forecast when a decision may be taken.

32. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations he has had with the West German Government about the possible replacement of the WE177 free-fall nuclear bomb.

61. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations he has had with the West German Government about the possible replacement of the WE177 free-fall nuclear bomb.

98. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations he has had with the West German Government about the possible replacement of the WE177 free-fall nuclear bomb.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Women Personnel

31. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department intends increasing the role of women in the services.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The services are implementing a number of proposals, and are considering others, to increase significantly the range of duties that may be undertaken by women, subject to the Government's policy of not employing them in direct combat roles.

Defence Exports

34. Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many jobs are currently directly and indirectly supported by defence exports.

Mr. Alan Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1989" (Cm. 675-II, volume 2, table 6-8).

Combat Aircraft

35. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effect on the Royal Air Force of the proposals tabled in Vienna for ceilings on numbers of combat aircraft.

44. Mr. Lamond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effect on the Royal Air Force of the proposals tabled in Vienna for ceilings on numbers of combat aircraft.

72. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effect on the Royal Air Force of the proposals tabled in Vienna for ceilings on numbers of combat aircraft.

93. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effect on the Royal Air Force of the proposals tabled in Vienna for ceilings on numbers of combat aircraft.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is too early to say what the effect of any agreement on conventional forces in Europe would be on the forces of particular states.

Tornado

36. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what comparative figures he has for the accident rates for Tornado aircraft for each of the European countries which operate these aircraft.

57. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what comparative figures he has for the accident rates for Tornado aircraft for each of the European countries which operate these aircraft.

75. Mr. Harry Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what comparative figures he has of the accident rates for Tornado aircraft for each of the European countries which operate these aircraft.

Mr. Neubert: I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths).

Disaster Relief

39. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what role the services have taken this year in disaster relief operations.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: So far in 1989, the principal contribution to disaster relief overseas by the armed forces has been in the eastern Caribbean in September, dealing with the effects of Hurricane Hugo. HMS Alacrity and RFA Brambleleaf were delployed to the striken region where they carried out and co-ordinated relief operations in Montserrat and on neighbouring islands. An RAF Hercules was used to fly in a disaster relief team of Royal Engineers together with stores from the garrison in Belize. Hercules aircraft also undertook a regular shuttle of stores from Antigua to Montserrat and transported elements of the Bermuda Defence Regiment to assist with relief work in the British Virgin Islands.

The armed forces have also provided support to the civil emergency authorities in the United Kingdom. After the tragic air disasters at Lockerbie and Kegworth all three services rendered assistance. At Lockerbie, up to 500 personnel per day were involved in the operation to recover bodies and search for wreckage during the period December 1988—January 1989. Similar assistance was given at Kegworth in January 1989 but on a smaller scale.

Nuclear Missiles

40. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the Government's modernisation programme for short-range nuclear missiles.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) on 14 June at column 478.

Nuclear Weapons (Carriage by Sea)

41. Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the efficiency of current technology to ascertain whether nuclear weapons are being carried at sea.

85. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the efficiency of current technology to ascertain whether nuclear weapons are being carried at sea.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden).

Stand-off Missiles

42. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his United States counterpart about stand-off missiles.

69. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his United States counterpart about stand-off missiles.

74. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his United States counterpart about stand-off missiles.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam).

Service Accommodation

43. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the need to upgrade service accommodation.

56. Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the need to upgrade service accommodation.

59. Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the need to upgrade service accommodation.

67. Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the need to upgrade service accommodation.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The need to upgrade service accommodation, brought about by the continuing aging process and the ongoing and comparatively recent changes to enhance accommodation standards, is assessed by the three services and the Property Services Agency. Each service operates a rolling programme of modernisation for single living accommodation and married quarters and provision is made within the Defence Estimates for this purpose. In order to enhance the present rate of modernisation a further £260 million has been provided over the next 10 years.

NATO Defence Ministers

45. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when was the last meeting of NATO Defence Ministers; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Tom King: NATO Defence Ministers are meeting at the nuclear planning group in Portugal today to discuss a range of nuclear issues.

NATO (Out-of-Area Capability)

47. Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what part the United Kingdom armed forces play in NATO's out-of-area capability.

100. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's armed forces role in NATO's out-of-area capability.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: NATO has no out-of-area role. The United Kingdom's armed forces do, however, maintain an out-of-area capability, as described in successive "Statements on the Defence Estimates."

Soviet Navy

48. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any evidence that the Soviet Union is reducing its naval capability.

90. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any evidence that the Soviet Union is reducing its naval capability.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There is no evidence to suggest that the Soviet Union is reducing its naval capability. Despite the announced intention to cut Soviet military spending, the pace of modernisation in the Soviet Navy continues unabated in all the key areas of capability.

Environmental Protection

49. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to ensuring that the activities pursued by his Department have minimal adverse effect upon the natural environment.

52. Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to ensuring that the activities pursued by his Department have minimal adverse effect upon the natural environment.

63. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to ensuring that the activities pursued by his Department have minimal adverse effect upon the natural environment.

68. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to ensuring that the activities pursued by his Department have minimal adverse effect upon the natural environment.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Ministry of Defence has long recognised the importance of policies which respect the environment whilst meeting operational needs. I would in particular refer the hon. Members to the reply my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces gave on 9 May at column 418 to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick).

Chemical Weapons

50. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any evidence that the Soviet Union is reducing its chemical warfare capability.

83. Mr. Carttiss: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any evidence that the Soviet Union is reducing its chemical warfare capacity.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We have no evidence that the Soviet Union is reducing its chemical warfare capability.

Warsaw Pact

51. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any evidence that the Warsaw pact has reduced its capability to undertake surprise large-scale offensive operations.

99. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any evidence that the Warsaw pact has reduced its capability to undertake surprise, large-scale offensive operations.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Some of the unilateral force withdrawals announced by Gorbachev and other Warsaw pact leaders have now been completed. However, we have no evidence that the Warsaw pact has reduced its ability to undertake large-scale offensive operations, even though the element of surprise which they could achieve may have been reduced.

91. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the conventional forces limitation negotiations will reduce the Warsaw pact's capability to undertake surprise, large-scale offensive operations.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A successful outcome to the negotiations on conventional armed forces in Europe will achieve a stable and secure balance at lower levels of forces, as well as the elimination of disparities and the capacity for launching surprise attack and large-scale offensive action.

Nuclear Test Veterans

53. Dr. Moonie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further considerations he has given to compensation arrangements for nuclear test veterans and their dependants.

77. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further consideration he has given to compensation arrangements for nuclear test veterans and their dependants.

79. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further consideration he has given to compensation arrangements for nuclear test veterans and their dependants.

82. Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further consideration he has given to compensation arrangements for nuclear test veterans and their dependants.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We will pay compensation where there is firm evidence to show that participants in the United Kingdom nuclear test programme suffered ill-health as a result of exposure to radiation during the course of their duties. There are no plans to give further consideration to these compensation arrangements.

Nuclear Depth Charges

55. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decision he has reached about the possible replacement of the Royal Navy's nuclear depth charges.

Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decision he has reached about the possible replacement of the Royal Navy's nuclear depth charges.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decision he has reached about the possible replacement of the Royal Navy's nuclear depth charges.

Mr. Alan Clark: No decisions have yet been taken. The studies related to modernising the United Kingdom's theatre nuclear weapons capability are still continuing. Within these studies consideration is being given to the replacement of the full spectrum of United Kingdom tactical nuclear weapons, including sea-based systems.

European Fighter Aircraft

58. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decision has been reached on the development contract for the European fighter aircraft radar.

103. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decision has been reached on the development contract for the European fighter aircraft radar.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin).

Nuclear Submarines

60. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement about his Department's plans for the decommissioning of nuclear submarines.

89. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement about his Department's plans for the decommissioning of nuclear submarines.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid).

109. Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from Strathclyde regional council in the past month about the continued positioning of nuclear armed submarines on the Clyde.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I am not aware of any.

Territorial Army

62. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any intention of increasing the size of the Territorial Army.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We continue to keep this matter under review as part of the continuing overview of our overall defence effort. It remains our intention to expand the Territorial Army to the strengths already announced in "Defence Open Government Document 84/02", a copy of which is held in the Library. All of the new units planned —which include six infantry battalions—have formed and are recruiting.

81. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the result to date of the current recruitment drive for the Territorial Army.

37. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the result to date of the current recruitment drive for the Territorial Army.

102. Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the result to date of the current recruitment drive for the Territorial Army.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It must be stressed that the current volunteer reserve forces campaign has as its prime aim improving retention in the reserve forces, although we would expect to see some measure of spin-off on recruitment. Given the nature of the campaign, we do not yet have a sufficient spread of data to provide a statistical measure of any improvements. Nevertheless, the response from companies, trade organisations and individuals has been most encouraging.

Falkland Islands

64. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends reviewing Her Majesty's Government's military commitment to the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government remain committed to defend the Falkland Islanders' right to live in peace and security under a government of their own choosing. We keep the level of our military commitment to the Falkland Islands under constant review. We are satisfied that the garrison remains adequate for the present.

Deptartmental Assets

70. Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any new proposals to sell assets currently owned by his Department.

84. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any new proposals to sell assets currently owned by his Department.

54. Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any new proposals to sell assets currently owned by his Department.

66. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any new proposals to sell assets currently owned by his Department.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We continue to pursue opportunities to dispose of land, property and material which have become surplus to our requirements and to rationalise our assets in order to provide better value for money for the taxpayer.

Soviet Nuclear Forces

71. Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has made an assessment of the Soviet short-range nuclear forces capability.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: An assessment of Soviet short-range nuclear capability is contained in chapter 6 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1989" (Cm. 675–I). This capability has been marginally affected by force restructuring and unilateral withdrawals in Eastern Europe. The Soviets, however, continue to possess a formidable inventory of short-range nuclear-capable systems.

Gurkha Regiments

73. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to deploy Gurkha regiments to combat terrorism in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are no current plans to deploy Gurkha infantry regiments to Northern Ireland.

US Defence Department

78. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what subjects he expects to discuss when he next meets representatives of the United States Defence Department.

Mr. Tom King: I expect to discuss a wide range of matters of mutual interest.

Reserve Forces

80. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures his Department is taking to keep people in the reserve forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are a number of initiatives in train aimed at promoting retention within the reserve forces. Internal measures concentrate principally on improving the quality and interest of training, streamlining the dissemination of information to volunteers, review of a whole range of terms and conditions of service and rationalisation of the equipment programme. In the latter context, units will be re-equipped in strict accordance with role, whether they be regular or volunteer. In addition, recognising the need to harness the support of employers and family, we launched last year the volunteer reserve forces campaign, aimed at easing external pressures on volunteers by setting out in the clearest possible terms the vital role the reserve forces would be expected to play and, perhaps most importantly, highlighting the relevance of TA training to civilian life and thus drawing the attention of employers to how they can benefit from their employees in reserve forces activities.

Nuclear Weapons

86. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further studies he has conducted of the consequences for NATO's strategy of flexible response to the removal of all nuclear weapons.

106. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further studies his Department has conducted of the consequences for British defence policy of the abandonment of all nuclear weapons.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: At the Brussels summit in May all NATO Heads of Government agreed that for the foreseeable future there was no alternative to the Alliance strategy of deterrence, and that this strategy required a mix of nuclear forces, including Europe-based ground-launched missiles. Given this, there is no reason to conduct any studies related to the removal of all nuclear weapons.

F111 Aircraft

88. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions the NATO nuclear planning group has had concerning the possible deployment of additional F111 aircraft.

92. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions the NATO nuclear planning group has had concerning the possible deployment of additional F111 aircraft.

Mr. Tom King: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn).

United Nations Peacekeeping Forces

94. Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British service personnel are currently serving with United Nations peacekeeping forces; and in what locations.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Currently 714 British service personnel are serving with the United Nations peacekeeping forces in Cyprus and 113 with the United Nations transition advisory group in Namibia, although this is not, strictly speaking, a peacekeeping force. There are also 37 British service personnel serving with the multinational force and observers group in Sinai, which is a multinational peacekeeping force not under United Nations control.

In addition to the provision of personnel, considerable logistic support is given to multinational peacekeeping operations. The sovereign base areas in Cyprus are used to provide logistic support for the multinational force and observers group in Sinai, the United Nations interim force in Lebanon and the United Nations disengagement observer force in the Golan Heights.

NATO (Central Front)

97. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there are any proposals to alter the current force-to-space ratio on NATO's central front.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: NATO's forces in the central region are kept under constant review within the normal force planning cycle. In due course, the Alliance may need to take account of any changes in force structures agreed as a result of the current negotiations on conventional forces in Europe.

Cavalry Officers

101. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the importance of horsemanship skills for cavalry officers.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Good equestrian skills are essential for all cavalry officers in units which have a mounted ceremonial role.

Trident

104. Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends altering the Trident programme.

Mr. Tom King: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell).

Crown Proceedings Act

105. Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the annual number of service people likely to benefit financially from the repeal of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act; and at what annual cost.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Since the repeal in May 1987 of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947, we have received more than 700 claims. Of these, about 100 have so far been settled at a cost of around £550,000. A further 450 cases are still under consideration. It is not possible to provide an accurate estimate of either the annual number of service people likely to benefit from the repeal, or the cost to the Department.

Fishing Boat—Submarine Incidents

107. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received about incidents involving fishing boats and submarines; and what action he is taking.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My Department has received a number of letters from fishermen's organisations and from other interested groups or individuals about various incidents in which submarines are alleged to have been involved. Though naval vessels have been involved in only a small number of incidents, the Royal Navy regards the avoidance by submarines of fishing vessels and their nets as a matter of considerable importance and is establishing closer links with fishermen's associations in order to promote mutual understanding. The Navy is also actively investigating methods of reducing the likelihood of such incidents.

Tanks

110. Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the numbers of battle tanks, in the European theatre, of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and Warsaw pact forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: The numbers of main battle tanks of NATO and Warsaw pact in the European theatre are shown in the 1989 "Statement on Defence Estimates", as 16,400 for NATO and 51,500 for the Warsaw pact.

Recruitment

108. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the rate of recruitment for the armed forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Total recruitment into the armed forces in 1988-89 was a little above the level achieved in the previous year, though it fell short of the targets set. This year we are taking measures to stimulate recruitment, including greater expenditure on advertising, some changes to entry requirements and the opening up of additional areas of employment to women. In addition a wide range of measures are being taken to improve retention.

Procurement (Savings)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has for further savings on his budget for defence procurements.

Mr. Alan Clark: We will continue to seek value for money through a commercial approach to procurement, including the use of competition to the maximum extent possible. Potential savings or additions to the programme itself are considered each year as part of the long-term costing process.

Procurement Project Managers

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many procurement project managers are in post; what are their grades; what salaries attach to each grade; and where is the work location of each.

Mr. Alan Clark: There are 153 project managers in post in the equipment procurement branches of the Procurement Executive. The civilian project managers are in unified grade 6, while their military equivalents are captain (RN), colonel and group captain. Their current salary scales are:

	£ per annum
Unified Grade 6	[1]21,633-28,170
Captain RN	32,346-33,196
Colonel and Group Captain	32,346-35,748

[1] Under review.

Additional allowances are payable in London, and civilian staff may receive additions to their salary for consistent good performance. The main work locations are London (86 staff), Bath (38), Weymouth (13) and Portsmouth (13).

Collaborative Projects

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the value to United Kingdom companies or research bodies of the collaborative projects set out in table 6, page 32 of Cm. 675-I; and what was the proportion expended in (a) Scotland and (b) south-east England.

Mr. Alan Clark: In 1989-90 the proportion of the United Kingdom equipment budget spent on collaborative projects, including contracts placed with United Kingdom industry, was about 15 per cent. of the total £8,258 million. The further information requested could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

RAF Chivenor

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will take steps to ensure that helicopters with search and rescue night flying capacity are stationed at RAF Chivenor;

(2) if he will make it his policy to ensure that helicopters with a search and rescue night flying capacity are stationed at RAF Chivenor.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We have no plans to do so.

Warsaw Pact Helicopters

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment his Department has made of current Warsaw pact helicopter capability for offensive warfare.

Mr. Tom King: The Warsaw pact has a large fleet of helicopters, about 4,000 in Europe alone, most of which can be armed with a variety of weapons systems. They could present a formidable offensive threat when used as part of a combined arms operation.

Marilyn Report

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action he has now taken in the light of the recommendations of the Marilyn report.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Work continues on a number of measures aimed at improving recruitment and retention in the Army. I told the House during the Army debate on 8 June 1989, at column 389, that additional funds have been devoted to recruitment publicity. This has resulted in a welcome increase in both inquiries and applications.

Work continues in a variety of areas described in the Marilyn report, for example the introduction of a remedial physical development course has enabled over 200 recruits, who would otherwise have failed to meet Army fitness standards, to complete their basic training and begin Army careers.

We have also successfully introduced a policy facilitating transfers between corps and regiments. The number of servicemen who were unhappy in their original choice of arm and have opted to transfer within the Army rather than to leave altogether has risen by almost 26 per cent.

The Army has decided to expand significantly the role of women. This could in due course result in up to 10,000 regular and reserve posts currently filled by men becoming available to women for the first time. The measures will provide the opportunity for women to join regiments and corps which until now have been all male.

Warsaw Pact (Military Observers)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what results during the last five years have been obtained by British military observers in Warsaw pact countries, under the auspices of the Stockholm agreement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Stockholm document was signed in September 1986 and came into force on 1 January 1987. Our experience has been that Warsaw pact exercises have been in compliance with the provisions of the Stockholm document.

NATO Nuclear Planning Group

Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the NATO nuclear planning group last met; and what items were on the agenda.

Mr. Tom King: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock).

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his assessment of the defence implications of the construction of the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Channel tunnel is not at present included in our reinforcement plans, which continue to be based on the use of ferries with a line of communication through the low countries. The tunnel itself does not in our view pose a significant threat to the security of the United Kingdom. Plans to defend it in an emergency are being drawn up.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Irradiated Food

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the seminar on food irradiation, sponsored by the Agriculture and Food Research Council's Institute for Food Research, held on 18 September.

Mr. Maclean: The seminar was organised by the Institute of Food Research in view of the widespread current interest in food irradiation. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food agreed to give the opening address. The seminar brought together United Kingdom and international experts in all aspects of the subject. Their review and evaluation of effects of the process confirmed the safety, wholesomeness—including the nutritional value—of food in line with the Government's recent decision. There was widespread acceptance of this overall conclusion and a general recognition of the useful part that food irradiation could play by killing such micro-organisms as salmonella, listeria and camplyobacter.

Farmers

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to increase the number of working farmers (a) aged under 40 years and (b) entering the industry at any age.

Mr. Maclean: The numbers of those becoming working farmers is entirely a matter for individual choice in response to personal circumstances and market forces.

Straw Burning

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received in the current year about straw stubble burning; and if he is proposing to take steps to ban the practice.

Mr. Maclean: By 20 October 1989, I had received 508 letters covering 744 representations on straw and stubble burning. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has already announced a far-reaching review of this matter in which we will be taking account of these and all the other representations received by my Department.

Pesticides

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for which of the following pesticides he has given approval: (a) aldicarb, (b) camphechlor, (c) chlordane, (d) heptachlor, (e) chlordioleform, (f) DBCP, (g) DDT, (h) aldrin, (i) dieldrin, (j) endrin, (k) EDB, (l) HCH/BHC-olindane, (m) paraquat, (n) ethyl parathion, (o) methyl parathion, (p) pentachlorophenol and (q) 2-4-5- T; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to Her Majesty's Stationery Office reference book 500 "Pesticides 1989" which lists those pesticides approved under the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986 and is available in the Library of the House.

Abattoirs

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each of the last 10 years the amount of European Community money which has been used to upgrade abattoirs; how many abattoirs have received this aid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: It is entirely a commercial matter for the companies concerned whether or not they decide to upgrade their abattoirs. Over the last 10 years a number of red meat abattoirs have been upgraded to European Community-approved status with financial assistance from the European Community, but because of the way in which the funds are paid by the European Commission the information sought by the hon. Member is not readily available in the form requested. It will be supplied as soon as possible.

Laboratories

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the name and location of any of his laboratories he has closed since March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Since March to date the subordinate microbiology laboratories of the ADAS farm and countryside service at Accrington, Newcastle and Wye have closed. Arrangements are in hand to maintain a full laboratory service to the areas affected.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the names and locations of the following: veterinary laboratories, including outstations and investigation centres, the Agricultural Development Advisory Service farm countryside laboratories, including the facilities for milk testing, the Agricultural Development Advisory Service research and development laboratories and fisheries research laboratories; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is as follows:

Food Packaging

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all the research projects he is funding into the packaging of food; which of these have been identified as being near market; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The following research projects relating to the packaging of food are currently being funded by my Department. Only projects 18 and 19 on the list are classified as near market and funding on this research will end before March 1990. The remainder will continue as necessary in line with the Government's commitment to address and resolve food safety and hygiene issues of concern to taxpayers, consumers, producers and industry.

(1) The effects of electron-beam irradiation on additives present in food contact plastics.
(2) Examination of the possibility of setting testing priorities for substances used in food contact materials.
(3) Mathematical and physical models of migration from food contact plastics.
(4) Assessment of consumer exposure to the differing types of retail packaging.
(5) Transformation of antioxidants during processing of polyolefins and subsequent migration.
(6) Feasibility study as to whether it is possible to set levels at which food contact materials become organoleptically unacceptable.
(7) Development of a simple method for the determination of fat on the surface of food.
(8) Migration from food-contact plastics (ovenable materials) at elevated temperatures.
(9) Migration from non-ovenable food contact materials at elevated temperatures.
(10) Migration testing of materials and articles intended for use in microwave ovens and combination ovens.
(11) Studies on vinyl chloride oligomers with a potential for migration into foods.
(12) Migration from metal containers into foods.
(13) Secondary interactions of species migrating into food.
(14) Development of analytical methods for substances on EC positive list of monomers for food contact materials.
(15) Feasibility of producing extracts of plastics for toxicological testing.
(16) Feasibility of setting up a reference collection of monomers and additives used in food contact plastics.
(17) Development of analytical methods for and measurement of migration of mineral hydrocarbons from food contact materials into foods.
(18) Optimum conditions for maintaining quality in packaged fruit and vegetables.
(19) Packaging Techniques for Improved Storage and Display.

Fishing Quotas

Mr. Godman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether with reference to the interim order of the President of the European Court of Justice, Case No. 246/89R, made on 10 October, he is in a position to estimate the number of fishing vessels which are now enabled to fish under United Kingdom quotas; what their approximate share of the various quotas is likely to be; if he will list the species they may catch and in which fishing grounds they can operate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The European Court's order effects only the nationality criteria of part II of the Merchant Shipping Act 1988. The requirement that owners of British fishing vessels should be resident and domiciled in the United Kingdom remains, as does the need for vessels to be controlled and managed from here. We expect that these restrictions will seriously limit the number of de-registered vessels which will be able to come back on to our register and fish against our quotas.

Cash Limits

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether it is intended to change the cash limit on any departmental vote for which he has responsibility.

Mr. Gummer: Yes. Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for Class IV, Vote 4 (other agricultural and food services and support for the fishing industry) will be increased by £300,000 from £148,631,000 to £148,931,000 to make provision for a single contribution to the International Sugar Organisation and the International Wheat Council. This contribution is being made towards a fund for stabilising rents over 10 years. The increase will be fully offset by a corresponding reduction by the Department of Trade and Industry in the cash limit for Class V, Vote 2 (support for industry (including research and development, protection of innovation, international trade, and enterprise and job creation programmes)) and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 25 October 1989

HOME DEPARTMENT

Broadcasting

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on plans to deregulate broadcasting.

Mr. Renton: We intend to introduce legislation which will authorise new television and radio services, set clear limits on broadcasting ownership, encourage competition and efficiency, and safeguard diversity and high quality in programming, to the benefit of viewers and listeners.

Immigration

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current average length of time it takes his Department to process an application for (a) registration and (b) naturalisation.

Mr. Renton: The average time taken to complete applications for registrations and naturalisations in September 1989 was 20 and 24 months respectively. We anticipate that there will be a substantial improvement during 1990-91 when the backlog of 1987 registrations has been cleared.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the current backlog of unopened mail at the immigration and nationality department as at 17 October.

Mr. Renton: On 17 October there were 7,201 items of mail unopened. The average delay in opening correspondence, in order to deal with it, is about two weeks.

Police Committees

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the cost of running statutory police consultation committees for London boroughs in the past years (a) for Ealing borough and (b) for all those boroughs with a statutory police committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The cost of running the Ealing community and police consultative group in the 1988-89 financial year was £30,500.

Each group operates independently and levels of expenditure are affected by the amount of each group's activity, the nature and location of the borough and the degree of council support. In the case of Ealing, the majority party borough council has refused to take up its place on the group or provide any administrative support. The cost to the Metropolitan police fund has therefore to cover the cost of independent administrative support to the group.

The refusal of Ealing borough council—together with four other local authorities in London—to take part in the statutory process of police-community consultation is misconceived and irresponsible. I urge them to support arrangements which are playing an increasingly important role elsewhere in London and throughout England and Wales in involving local people in policing issues that concern them. Figures for the other consultative groups which come within the Metropolitan police district are as follows:

Crime (Compensation)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what moves he intends taking with EEC Governments to ensure that those British subjects who are victims of crime within the EEC are able to claim compensation equivalent to the criminal injuries compensation paid to EEC nationals who are victims of crime in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Patten: When we ratify the Council of Europe convention on the compensation of victims of violent crime, British citizens who suffer criminal injuries (or their dependants if they are killed) in countries party to the convention will be able to obtain compensation in those countries. We have to examine some of the detailed requirements of the convention before we ratify it.

Once we have ratified, we shall take every opportunity to encourage other countries (including the European Community countries) to do likewise.

Fire Safety

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to improve fire safety in (a) offices and (b) schools.

Mr. John Patten: Offices where more than 20 persons are at work at any one time or more than 10 persons are at work elsewhere than on the ground floor, are already required to have a fire certificate unless they have been exempted by the fire authority from this requirement. Fire authorities have powers to enforce the requirements of fire certificates which require offices to be provided with adequate means of escape and means for fighting fire and to provide training for employees in action to be taken in the event of fire.

In offices which do not require a fire certificate, the occupier must by law provide such means of escape in case of fire and such means for fighting fire as may reasonably be required.

Guidance for occupiers in the form of a code of practice for fire precautions in factories, offices, shops and railway premises not required to have a fire certificate was issued in April. It is available to the public from HMSO outlets.

The Home Office will be publishing next month a basic guide to fire safety at work which will also be available from HMSO outlets. It is aimed not only at occupiers, but at all those with management responsibility.

Fire safety in schools is primarily a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Public House Bombings (Guildford and Woolwich)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will authorise the payment of interim compensation to the four persons whose convictions for the Guildford and Woolwich pub bombings were recently quashed.

Mr. Hurd: It is my normal practice to make interim compensation payments where these are requested. The amount will be decided by the independent assessor.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider appointing lay assessors to Sir John May's inquiry into the Guildford and Woolwich bombings convictions; and if the evidence to the inquiry will be published.

Mr. Hurd: I would be prepared to consider the appointment of lay assessors if Sir John May feels this is necessary for the conduct of his inquiry.

Anybody giving evidence to the inquiry may, if they wish, publish it, and there will be hearings in public. The question of publishing evidence not given in public will be considered when the inquiry is complete.

Anglo-Irish Relations

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, with a view to improving Anglo-Irish relations, he will reconsider the request of Irish Republican category 'A' prisoners held in English prisons to be transferred to Northern Ireland to alleviate the suffering and hardship caused to their families; and whether there are any plans to close a high security prison in Northern Ireland due to the dwindling prison population in the Province.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Requests by prisoners for permanent transfer to Northern Ireland are considered in the light of the criteria set out in the reply by my right hon. Friend to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) on Friday 23 June 1989 at column 263. These criteria, which do not distinguish between category A and other inmates, deal not only with the circumstances of the inmate in question but also with any family circumstances which may be put forward in support of a transfer request. It is open to any inmate whose transer request is refused to make a fresh application which would be considered in the light of the criteria and the circumstances applying at the time of the fresh request.

Prisons in Northern Ireland are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland from whom I understand that there are currently no plans to close any prison establishment in the Province.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what nationalities has the chief constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, Mr. Hugh Annesley.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 23 October 1989]: The nationality status of individuals is a private matter.

WALES

Speech Therapists

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to overcome the shortage of speech therapists in Wales.

Mr. Grist: Speech therapy requirements have been examined in the context of the annual manpower resource planning exercise undertaken by the Health Service in Wales in 1988 and 1989. The purpose of the exercise, initiated by the manpower steering group established by the Department in 1986, is to identify future manpower requirements and enable action to be taken to meet these requirements at the all-Wales level.

The report of the 1988 manpower resource planning exercise recommended an increase in speech therapy provision within Wales. This is being considered within the context of the provision of education and training within the NHS in Wales generally and taking into account the results of the 1989 manpower resource plans (a report of which will be available early next year), the implications of the proposals contained in the White Paper "Working for Patients" and the recommendations contained in the report of a review of the role of the combined training institute at Cardiff.

Water Supplies

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of measures taken following the drought which affected Welsh water supplies in 1976, especially in the light of the shortage of supplies in the reservoirs this summer.

Mr. Grist: A number of improvements have been made to the water supply distribution system since 1976. Of particular note is the River Wye transfer scheme and the establishment of a mini-grid system in south-east Wales. Whilst this summer was the driest since 1910 in that area, the improvements have enabled Dŵr Cymru Cyf to maintain supplies despite the low level of water in local reservoirs.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to ensure that water supplies in Wales are dependable even in future periods of drought.

Mr. Grist: It is the responsibility of Dŵr Cymru to ensure that water supplies within its area can be maintained at times of below-average rainfall. The company, in liaison with the NRA who have overall responsibility for water resource management, will keep the position under review.

Primary Schools

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each Welsh local education authority the number of primary schools with (a) fewer than 10 pupils, (b) fewer than 20 pupils, (c) fewer than 30 pupils, (d) fewer than 40 pupils, (e) fewer than 50 pupils, (f) fewer than 60 pupils, (g) between 60 and 100 pupils, (h) between 100 and 150 pupils and (i) between 150 and 200 pupils.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested, based on the position at January 1989, is shown in the table:

Number of pupils	Clwyd	Dyfed	Gwent	Gwynedd	Mid Glamogan	Powys	South Glamorgan	West Glamorgan
Fewer than 10 pupils	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Fewer than 20 pupils	8	5	1	2	1	2	0	0
Fewer than 30 pupils	17	36	9	19	3	20	1	1
Fewer than 40 pupils	29	77	11	35	7	29	2	4

150-199 pupils	31	35	56	22	107	8	36	45

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of primary schools closed by each Welsh local education authority in each year since 1974 in each of the following categories, (a) fewer than 10 pupils, (b) fewer than 20 pupils, (c) fewer than 30 pupils, (d) fewer than 40 pupils, (e) fewer than 50 pupils, (f) fewer than 60 pupils, (g) between 60 and 100 pupils, (h) between 100 and 150 pupils and (i) between 150 and 200 pupils.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information in the form requested is not available. I will write to my hon. Friend.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the purpose of the office and management support system for tax compliance based at Basingstoke, Telford and Worthing; and what measures have been taken to ensure the system will comply fully with the provisions of the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Lilley: The Inland Revenue has introduced a new office and management support system in its specialist investigation offices. The main purpose of this relatively small computer system is to collate factual information and avoid duplicate research by the Revenue's investigators in those offices. The system will also monitor progress on investigations and includes a full range of automated office functions such as diaries, electronic mail and computational facilities. The system became operational in September and is distinct from the large COP/CODA computer project which has been operational for sometime, and provides support for local tax districts.

The Data Protection Act has been fully complied with and the system has been registered with the Data Protection Register.

Tax Appeal Hearings

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the revised system of testing taxpayers' cases for Inland Revenue apeal hearings before the general commissioners; and if he will take steps to ensure that the new computerised system meets the reasonable needs of accountants and others representing the appellants.

Mr. Lilley: Representations have been received from accountants and clerks to general commissioners on the new computerised procedures used by the Inland Revenue in listing cases for general commissioners hearings and printing the clerk's notices. An evaluation exercise will shortly be undertaken which will take full account of representations received.

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing (a) the estimated total cost of mortgage tax relief in 1989-90, (b) the average value of relief per mortgagor and (c) the numbers receiving mortgage relief broken down in the income ranges (i) under £4,000, (ii) £4,000 to £5,000, (iii) £5,000, (iv) £5,000 to £6,000 (v) £6,000 to £7,000, (vi) £7,000 to £8,000, (vii) £8,000 to £9,000, (viii)

£9,000 to £10,000, (ix) £10,000 to £12,000, (x) £12,000 to £15,000, (xi) £15,000 to £20,000, (xii) £20,000 to £25,000, (xiii) £25,000 to £30,000 and (xiv) over £30,000.

Mr. Lilley: Information on the distribution of mortgage interest relief by range of total income is available from projections of the data from the 1986-87 survey of personal incomes and the 1986 family expenditure survey. However, all estimates are provisional.

Latest estimates for 1989-90 are given in the table and include mortgages formerly under the option mortgage scheme which are now subsumed within MIRAS. The estimates take account of the recently announced increases in mortgage interest rates.

Tax units receiving mortgage interest relief by range of total income 1989-90

Rugby Players (Income Tax)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what income tax receipts were received on fees paid to rugby union players in the last financial year.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 23 October 1989]: I regret that it is not possible to identify from the information available about income tax receipts the amount paid by rugby union players.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Financial Reporting Council

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make an announcement about the appointment of a chairman of the Financial Reporting Council.

Mr. Redwood: In the light of my Department's consultations with interested parties about the implementation of the structural proposals in the Dearing report on the making of accounting standards, I have asked Sir Ronald Dearing, and he has agreed, to become chairman designate of the Financial Reporting Council. His task will be to negotiate terms with all concerned so that the new arrangements for making and enforcing accounting standards are in place next summer.

When the Financial Reporting Council is established, it is the intention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, acting jointly with the Governor of the Bank of England, formally to appoint Sir Ronald as chairman of the council.

Clear unambiguous accounting standards which are effectively enforced are essential to the good working of a market economy. The report of the committee chairman by Sir Ronald has been widely welcomed as identifying the way to enhance the authority and general acceptance of accounting standards. I can think of nobody who is better qualified to carry through the important task of setting up the new arrangements, and I am delighted that Sir Ronald has agreed to undertake this role.

DRG (Takeover Bid)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the action he is taking concerning the proposed takeover bid for DRG by Pembridge Investments.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 24 July 1989]: The proposed acquisition by Pembridge Investments of DRG is currently being considered by the Director General of Fair Trading who will advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the normal way on the question of reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

China (Textiles)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will seek to arrange for the EEC Commission to renegotiate agreements with China concerning textile imports from China within the EEC; what representations he has received about increased Chinese textile quotas to the United Kingdom; what action he is taking to reduce Chinese textile imports into the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 24 July 1989]: No. The bilateral textiles agreement negotiated between the European Community and China under the multi-fibre arrangement at the end of the last year lasts for four years. I understand the concern that has been expressed in a number of representations to me and to my Department about the increased levels of access for Chinese textile and clothing products under this agreement. However we were satisfied that the new agreement was the best that the Commission could achieve.

We continue to watch developments closely and if unrestrained imports from China cause or threaten to cause disruption to the United Kingdom market, Ministers would be willing to consider whether it would be in the United Kingdom interest to put a case to the EC Commission for restraint action under the provisions of this agreement.

SCOTLAND

CBI

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many meetings he has had with the Confederation of British Industry in the past 12 months.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 18 October to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell).

Labour Statistics

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the total figures and percentage rates of unemployed people in each individual Glasgow constituency; and what were the comparable figures in 1979, 1983 and 1987.

Mr. Lang: The information is not available in the precise form requested. The table below gives the number unemployed in each Glasgow parliamentary constituency in August 1989, the latest date for which information is available, together with comparable figures for 1983 and 1987. There are no unemployment estimates for parliamentary constituencies prior to June 1983. Percentage rates for unemployment are not calculated for parliamentary constituencies.

Glasgow Parliamentary Constituencies	August 1983	August 1987	August 1989
Cathcart	4,249	4,196	2,976
Central	6,754	7,301	5,641
Garscadden	6,204	5,648	4,482
Govan	5,975	5,922	4,609
Hillhead	4,939	5,787	4,267
Maryhill	7,226	7,771	6,097
Pollok	7,405	6,945	5,382
Provan	9,437	7,915	5,902
Rutherglen	7,131	6,313	4,574
Shettleston	6,610	6,324	5,055
Springburn	8,334	8,152	6,402

[1] There have been a number of changes in the compiliation and coverage of the unemployment count. Therefore the figures given above are not directly comparable with each other.

Interest Rates

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received from the Confederation of British Industry about the effect of high interest rates on the Scottish economy.

Mr. Lang: I am aware of recent statements by the Confederation of British Industry on the interest rate rise announced on 5 October. The Government continue to believe that interest rates are the most effective weapon to counter the risks of inflation.

Forensic Scientists

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many forensic scientists were employed by his office in (a) Scotland, (b) the Strathclyde region and (c) Greater Glasgow for each year since 1979.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In Scotland, forensic scientists working in police laboratories are employed by the police authority concerned. Figures of the numbers so employed are as follows:

	Scotland	Strathclyde region (all located in Glasgow)
1979	21	14
1980	21	14
1981	21	14
1982	22	14
1983	24	14
1984	24	14
1985	25	14
1986	33	20
1987	33	20
1988	34	20
1989	38	20

Caledonian MacBrayne

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is now in a position to announce the membership of the board of Caledonian MacBrayne.

Mr. Rifkind: I am at present considering possible membership of the board and will make an announcement as soon as possible.

Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of letters from hon. Members to his Department received a reply (a) in under four weeks, (b) within four to six weeks, (c) within six to eight weeks and (d) over eight weeks, in each of the last three years.

Mr. Rifkind: Disproportionate costs would be incurred in the preparation of an answer in the form requested. An ad hoc survey conducted within my Department during a representative period in 1988 showed an average response time of 23 days.

Residential Homes

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many mentally ill and handicapped people live in residential homes and hostels in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: As at 31 March 1988, the latest date for which information is available centrally, 226 mentally ill persons and 1,713 persons with mental handicap were resident in local authority homes and homes registered by them. Comprehensive information on unregistered accommodation is not available but 304 mentally ill and 464 mentally handicapped persons were recorded as resident in other establishments of which local authority social work departments were aware. Also at the same date 770 persons resident in homes for the elderly were described as mentally ill and some 620 as mentally handicapped.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many physically handicapped aged under 65 years live in residential homes in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: As at 31 March 1988, the latest date for which information is available, there were 749 persons under 65 reported as physically handicapped in local authority homes and homes registered by them.

One-parent Families

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of one-parent families recorded in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: From the latest available information it is estimated that there were some 100,000 one-parent families in Scotland in 1986.

Institutions

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of persons aged over 75 years live in institutions in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest information available is from the 1981 census of population which recorded 9·1 per cent. of residents of Scotland aged 75 years and over as residing in establishments other than private households.

Sheltered Housing

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the total housing stock is comprised of sheltered housing; and what proportion is provided by local authorities, housing associations and the private sector in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Reliable information is available centrally only for public housing authorities and for housing associations. As at 31 March 1989, the latest date for which information is available, these agencies provided some 26,555 sheltered houses representing approximately 2·6 per cent. of the total stock of these agencies (1,016,000).

This total is broken down as follows:

	Number	Percentage
Local authorities	14,703	55·4
Scottish Special Housing Association	1,768	6·7
New towns	434	1·6
Housing associations	9,650	36·3
Total	26,555

Dounreay

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has completed his consideration of the application by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and British Nuclear Fuels plc for permission to construct a demonstration fast reactor fuel reprocessing plant at Dounreay.

Mr. Rifkind: I am announcing today my decision to approve this application, subject to conditions, and I have placed a copy of the decision letter in the Library.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Youth Service Training

Mr. Bright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many voluntary youth and community workers have received grant support for training in the youth service under the Education (No. 2) Act 1986 since the scheme came into operation;

(2) how many youth and community workers not employed by local education authorities are likely to receive grant-supported training in the current financial year.

Mr. Alan Howarth: It is estimated that some 105,000 youth and community workers in England will have received training by the end of this financial year, with support through the local education authority training grants scheme. This includes more than 33,000 workers in 1989-90. Separate figures for voluntary workers are not collected centrally.

Education (Greenwich)

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he intends to take in the light of the London borough of Greenwich's decision to change its secondary schools' admission policy contrary to the undertakings given in its education development plan as published in February 1989, thus excluding children living in the London borough of Lewisham from local schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Inner London borough development plans were published under section 165 of the Education Reform Act 1988 as a basis for local consultation designed to inform councils' formal policy decisions. In relation to school admissions, the relevent formal decisions are those subsequently reflected in admission arrangements published, by Greenwich as by other inner London boroughs, under section 8 of the Education Act 1980. Under section 6 of that Act, parents may express a preference for any school, regardless of its location; LEAs and governors are required to comply with that expression of parental preference, subject to strictly defined reliefs as set out in sections 6(3) and (6). LEAs and governors may not as part of their admission policy refuse to admit out-of-borough pupils. Where schools are oversubscribed, admission authorities may, however, give priority to in-borough children in the allocation of places, provided they make their policy clear in the information published under section 8.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Legal Aid

Mr. Madden: To ask the Attorney-General what representations he has received about the refusal rate to applications for legal aid from applications in Bradford; how many legal aid applications have been made by people living in Bradford in each of the last five years; and in each year to date how many applicants have been (a) successful and (b) unsuccessful.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor has received no representations about the refusal rate to applications for legal aid from applicants in Bradford. Information is not collected for civil legal aid or legal aid in the Crown Court in the form requested by the hon. Member. The following figures relate to the applications for legal aid in the magistrates' courts in the Bradford police force area:

	Number of applications made	Number granted	Number refused	Percentage refused
1984	3,694	3,377	317	8·6
1985	4,511	3,984	527	11·7
1986	3,915	3,586	329	8·4
1987	4,885	4,461	424	8·7
1988[1]	3,514	3,241	273	7·8

[1]No returns were received for one quarter in 1988.

ENERGY

Nuclear Co-operation

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give details of the agreement reached on nuclear co-operation between the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany; what levels of spent nuclear fuel and waste will be imported into the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Copies of the full text of the joint declaration on the peaceful use of nuclear energy, which was signed by the Governments of the United Kingdom ad the Federal Republic of Germany on 25 July 1989, have been placed in the Library of the House. No specific contracts for the reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel have yet been agreed as a result of the declaration. In line with Government policy, the contracts, when concluded, will provide for the return of wastes to the Federal Republic of Germany.

PRIME MINISTER

Downing Street

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the renovations and redecorations to the Prime Minister's personal apartment at Downing street; whether a designer or architect has been appointed; and what will be the overall cost of the work.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 23 October]: Apart from fitting cupboards, there has been no fundamental work on refurbishment or modernisation of the personal apartment at Downing street. Any redecoration or modernisation work has been undertaken by the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government have invited designers or architects to submit plans for the erection of gates at the Whitehall entrance to Downing street.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 23 October]: There has been a barrier at the Whitehall entrance to Downing street since 1973 and the present gates and railings were installed in 1982. It is intended to replace these with new gates and railings.

Plans for new demountable railings and gates have been prepared by the Property Services Agency in consultation with English Heritage and the Royal Fine Arts Commission. These have been agreed by Westminster city council.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government have prepared a budget for the erection of gates at the Whitehall entrance to Downing street.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 23 October]: All expenditure relating to Downing street is budgeted.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Prime Minister whether it is Her Majesty's Government's intention to erect gates at the Whitehall entrance to Downing street.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 23 October]: There has been a barrier at the Whitehall entrance to Downing street since 1973 and the present gates and railings were installed in 1982. It is intended to replace these with new gates and railings.

ENVIRONMENT

Greenhouse Effect

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has made any assessment of the claimed benefits of the greenhouse effect, made by the Soviet climatologist, Mikhail Budyko, in a paper to the United Nations environment programme in August;

(2) if his Department has made any assessment of the recent analysis by Dr. John Woods of the Marine and Atmospheric Sciences Division for the Natural Environment Research Council suggesting that the onset timescale for the greenhouse effect has been significantly underestimated;

(3) what study has been made by his Department, or under consultancy to his Department, of the plankton multiplier effect on the level that global warming may reach following the greenhouse effect.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Each of these matters is for consideration in the international review of climate change science being carried out by working group I of the intergovernmental panel on climate change (IPCC). This work is being led by the United Kingdom under the chairmanship of Dr. John Houghton, director general of the Meteorological Office and supported by funds totalling over £600,000 from the Departments of the Environment and Energy.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what initiatives he introduced to the Council of European Environmental Ministers to combat the greenhouse effect, at its meeting on 19 September.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: At the Council meeting on 19 September, my right hon. Friend continued to take the lead in initiatives for the conservation of tropical forests. In particular, he supported the redeployment of resources within the European Commission towards forestry, advocated the need for close collaboration with developing countries in taking forward projects for the sustainable management of forest resources, and expressed the hope that other EC countries would support the United Kingdom initiative at the Council of the International Tropical Timber Organisation for a feasibility study on an EC-wide labelling scheme for tropical timber imports.

Environmental Protection

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any information from the United States of America Government or Her Majesty's ambassador in Washington DC in regard to the implications for joint environmental protection research between the United States of America and the United Kingdom, of the proposed increases in the United States budget for environmental research in 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Joint environmental protection research between the United States of America and the United Kingdom is undertaken through a variety of arrangements, including a memorandum of understanding agreed in 1987. Collaborative work also takes place through the auspices of other bodies such as the United Nations environment programme, Economic Commission for Europe, and Intergovernmental Oceanographic Commission.

It is not possible at this stage to assess the implications for research collaboration of proposed increases in the United States budget for 1990 for environmental protection research.

Chlorofluorocarbons

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any information on the scientific assessment by Dr. Eric Banks of the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology of the potential harmful effects of chlorofluorocarbon ozone-friendly replacements, details of which were presented to the ninth European symposium on fluorine chemistry in September.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. I am arranging to obtain papers from Dr. Banks for assessment.

Sellafield (Accident)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the accident involving radioactivity at Sellafield on 5 September; when his Department was informed; and what were the causes and consequences of the accident.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My Department and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (the authorising Departments) were informed on the afternoon of that day of an event that had led to a slight over-emptying of a discharge tank. Checks by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food confirmed the view of British Nuclear Fuels that the event had not led to any breach of discharge limits or radiological consequences. A press release was issued by British Nuclear Fuels later that afternoon, and full details were also included in the site's regular newsletter, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Pollution Control Conference

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department was represented at the conference on the role of clean technologies in integrated pollution control, held at the University of Sheffield on 19 October.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No.

Waste Management Conference

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department was represented at, and presented any papers to, the conference on the future of waste management, held at the Botanical Gardens, Birmingham on 23 October.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A paper on the Department's proposals for waste regulation was presented at this conference.

Nuclear Waste

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what departmental papers were presented, and what departmental representation there was at (a) the PAGIS/Commission of the European Communities conference on nuclear waste in Madrid in June and (b) the Commission of the European Communities/International Atomic Energy Agency/OECD Nuclear Energy Agency sponsored conference on the safety assessment of radioactive waste repositories, in Paris, 9-13 October;

(2) what departmental representation was made, and what papers presented at the forum on radioactive waste repositories held in Paris between 9-13 October, organised by the Commission of the European Communities, the International Atomic Energy Agency and the Nuclear Energy Agency of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Two DOE officials attended the CEC PAGIS information day held in Madrid on 30 June 1989. No Departmental papers were presented.

Two DOE officials attended the CEC/IAEA/OECD (NEA) symposium on the safety assessment of radioactive waste repositories held in Paris from 9 to 13 October 1989. The following four papers co-authored by DOE officials were presented:

(i) 'The OECD Nuclear Energy Agency Probabilistic Assessment Codes (PSAC) User Group; Objectives, Achievements and Programme of Activities' by B G J Thompson et al.

(ii) 'The Development and Application of an Integrated Radiological Risk Assessment Procedure using Time Dependent Probabilistic Risk Analysis' by J-M Laurencs et al.

(iii) 'CHEMVAL—An International Research Initiative for the Verification and Validation Testing of Chemical Speciation and Chemical Transport Computer Programs' by T W Broyd et al.

(iv) 'Quality Assurance for Safety Assessment of Radioactive Waster Repositories' by I Hill et al.

1. The PAGIS (performance assessment of geological isolation systems) information day held in Madrid on 30 June 1989 was organised by by CEC to report on the Commission-funded research programme assessing radiological impact of radioactive waste disposal. PAGIS consisted of a series of generic studies to assess the radiological impact resulting from the disposal of high-level radioactive wastes in clay, granite and salt formations and in ocean sediments. Scientists drawn from a number of European, including United Kingdom, establishments were involved. The conclusion of the studies is that all four options should, in principle, allow for safe disposal of radioactive wastes. Reports of the studies have recently been published. The audience consisted of politicians, scientists and industry representatives, mainly from European Community member states. Two DOE officials attended; Mr. B. D. Ponsford, director of HMIP, who participated as the United Kingdom representative, in the concluding panel discussion, and Dr. S. Brown, head of research and assessments branch of HMIP. Sir Hugh Rossi MP gave the invited introductory talk.

2. The international symposium on the safety assessment of radioactive waste repositories held in Paris from 9-13 October 1989 was jointly organised by the Commission of the European Communities, the International Atomic Energy Agency and the Nuclear Energy Agency of the OECD. The aim of the conference was to give member countries an opportunity, based upon current experience, to summarise the state of the art on safety assessment issues and to discuss possible future developments. Two DOE officials attended; Dr. S. Brown, head of research and assessments branch, HMIP and Dr. B. Thompson, principal inspector, HMIP. A number of papers reporting work commissioned by DOE were presented as were four papers co-authored by DOE officials. The proceedings of the Symposium will be published by the nuclear Energy Agency of the OECD in due course.

Ministerial Meetings

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what meetings he has had since July with representatives of national, international and regional environmental pressure groups and non-governmental organisations; when they were held; what issues were raised; and if he will make a statement on his policy towards communications and co-operation with such organisations in policy development.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Since July, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has met representatives of Friends of the Earth for a general discussion of environmental issues, and representatives of the Council for the Protection of Rural England to discuss countryside matters.

In addition, my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside and I have had meetings on a range of environmental matters with a number of other bodies, including CLEAR, the British Conservation Trust, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, the Tidy Britain Group and UK 2000.

We welcome a dialogue with constructive and well-meaning environmental groups in order to strengthen mutual understanding of the issues that we face and the policy options that are available.

Gipsy Sites

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the number and location of designated gipsy sites in Warwickshire.

Mr. Chope: There are at present three local authority gipsy sites in Warwickshire. These are at Alvecote, near Tamworth, which has 17 pitches, at Griff, Nuneaton, 21 pitches, and at Pathlow, near Stratford-on-Avon, 29 pitches. There are, in addition, 54 caravan spaces for gipsies on eight authorised private sites elsewhere in the county.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give illustrative figures for the level of community charge (a) under the previously proposed system and (b) following the latest changes, for 1990-91, in pounds per adult for (i) Elmbridge, (ii) Surrey Heath, (iii) Waverley, (iv) Woking, (v) Hertsmere, (vi) North Hertfordshire, (vii) Three Rivers, (viii) Bradford, (ix) Calderdale, (x) Kirklees, (xi) Leeds and (xii) Wakefield, respectively.

Mr. David Hunt: The latest illustrative figures are those published on 19 July. The changes to the safety net and the scheme of transitional relief announced on 11 October will not affect community charges for 1990-91, except those for individuals entitled to the relief.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to introduce regulations which ensure that a carer who resides part-time in his own home and the remainder of the time in the home of a person being cared for will only pay one poll tax liability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave him on 27 July 1989 Official Report, column 931.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table indicating which local authorities gain and which authorities lose as a result of the Government's latest decisions on safety nets and the community charge, in terms of pounds sterling per adult.

Mr. David Hunt: For 1990-91 there is no change from the proposal for the safety net announced on 19 July. The proposal to abolish the safety net after 1990-91 will benefit chargepayers in those areas which would otherwise have had to contribute directly to the safety net. The position of areas benefiting from the safety net will be unchanged.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish his Department's estimate of how many households in Leeds will receive safety net payments on the community charge, according to the number of people in the household.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is not available. If the effect of the safety net is to reduce community charges in Leeds then the same reduced community charge will apply to each liable adult in every household.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish his Department's illustrative figures on the impact of the community charge on households in Leeds as a result of the recent decision, assuming that the local authority spends at its grant-related expenditure allocation level.

Mr. David Hunt: I have no information on the impact of the community charge on different types of households in individual local authority areas.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to which members of a four-person household which qualifies for safety-net payments under community charge transitional payment the reduction will be applied.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway) on 20 October, Official Report, column 262. Copies of the Department's further proposals document, which sets out the basis on which transitional relief should be given for larger households with three or more adults, are in the Libraries of the Houses of Parliament.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what inflation assumptions for local authority expenditure are made in his Department's indicative figures for the impact of the community charge.

Mr. David Hunt: I have published no indicative figures showing my estimate of future community charge levels. Illustrative figures were provided on 19 July based on local authority spending levels in 1989-90, which required no inflation assumption.

Radon Contamination

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how long it takes the National Radiological Protection Board to assess an individual's home monitoring unit for radon contamination, once it has been returned after the three-month survey period; and if the results are always notified to the occupier.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The National Radiological Protection Board usually completes assessments funded by the Department within 10 weeks of the end of the survey period. It always notifies the results to the occupier.

Limestone Workings

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what records are kept of old disused limestone mine workings in South Yorkshire; and where they are stored.

Mr. Moynihan: Since 1872, on the abandonment of mine workings plans have been required by statute to be deposited with the Secretary of State for Employment. Those for minerals other than coal are lodged with the Health and Safety Executive (Mining Records Office), and those for coal mines are lodged with the British Coal Corporation. Pre-1872 records are not kept centrally. However, mine records are held by Barnsley metropolitan borough council (as successor to South Yorkshire county council) to provide a mining advisory service to Barnsley, Doncaster and Rotherham metropolitan borough councils, and by Sheffield city council. It is not known whether any of these records would include old limestone mine workings.

Brodsworth Hall

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how far the negotiations of transferring Brodsworth hall, near Doncaster into the hands of the nation have progressed; and how much money the Government have put into the scheme to date.

Mr. Trippier: This is a matter for English Heritage and the National Heritage Memorial Fund. The Government have put no funds expressly into the acquisition of Brodsworth hall and its contents for the nation. If the negotiations with the owners prove successful it will be for English Heritage and the National Heritage Memorial Fund to find the necessary resources from their existing grant in aid.

African Elephants

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the current rate of depletion of the number of elephants inhabiting the African continent; and whether any improvement on the rate of depletion over the past 10 years is expected.

Mr. Trippier: Accurate information about the rate of decline is difficult to obtain, but it is generally accepted that in the last 10 years the population has declined by about 45 per cent. In the light of this, the recent CITES conference agreed the inclusion of the African elephant in appendix I of the convention. We hope that the stricter controls which will now apply to this species will halt its decline and that numbers will increase.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence is available on the effectiveness of the British Government's contribution to international efforts to save the African elephant from extinction.

Mr. Trippier: The Government have played their full part in international efforts to save the African elephant from extinction and were instrumental in the setting up of the CITES ivory trade monitoring unit. We were, however, dissatisfied with the effectiveness for conservation of the controls on ivory trade and in June we called on our European partners to introduce a ban on the import of African ivory and to support appendix I listing for the African elephant. I am delighted that the appendix I listing was approved at the recent CITES conference.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what fresh initiatives he proposes to take to help secure the future of the African elephant (a) through specifically British initiatives and (b) through joint action with European and other nations on a worldwide basis.

Mr. Trippier: At the recent CITES conference, the United Kingdom strongly suported the proposal to include the African elephant in appendix I of the convention. Furthermore, we were successful in obtaining approval for our resolution urging all party states to implement appendix I controls with immediate effect. It is for the African Governments concerned to work out a long-term conservation strategy to ensure the survival of this species, but we are always ready to consider any proposal from African countries for assistance with measures to conserve their populations of elephants.

Domestic Waste

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the names and numbers of local authorities which he considers operate satisfactory collection and recycling arrangements as far as domestic waste is concerned; and if he will list the names and numbers where such arrangements are either non-existent or inadequate.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not currently held on a systematic basis for all domestic waste streams. My Department, with the Department of Trade and Industry and the assistance of local authorities, are reviewing in each local authority area arrangements to encourage recycling in order to identify best practice and raise the level of recycling facilities generally. We will also be carefully evaluating the results of the major experiment in recycling—Recycling City—in Sheffield, which is supported by the Government.

Sheltered Housing

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the total housing stock is comprised of sheltered housing; and what proportion is provided by local authorities, housing associations and the private sector in England and Wales.

Mr. Chope: Estimates derived from local authorities' annual housing investment programme returns for April 1988 indicate that, of a total housing stock of some 19,142,000, 2·3 per cent. were sheltered dwellings, of which 68 per cent. were owned by local authorities, 25 per cent. by housing associations and 6 per cent. were privately owned.

For corresponding information about Welsh local authorities, I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Cash Incentive Scheme (Aylesbury Vale)

Mr. Raison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will approve an application by Aylesbury Vale district council to operate a cash incentive scheme under section 129 of the Housing Act 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Approval has today been given for Aylesbury Vale district council to incur expenditure of £100,000 in 1989-90 on cash incentive grants to help the council's tenants to buy homes of their own.

Many councils are coming to realise that cash incentives offer a cost-effective means of releasing council homes for reletting to homeless families and others in acute housing need. Since section 129 of the Housing Act 1988 came into effect on 1 April this year, 38 cash incentive schemes have been approved which will enable the councils concerned to spend up to £12 million on grants to secure 1,100 vacancies for reletting. Further schemes are under consideration. This is an encouraging start. Other councils should consider putting schemes forward for approval.

Phone and Post Boxes

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to require the positioning of telephone boxes and postal collection boxes to have planning permission.

Mr. Moynihan: The General Development Order 1988 enables the Post Office, British Telecom and other licensed telecommunications operators to undertake operations without applying for specific planning permission. In some special areas the operator must give notice to the local planning authority, which has a general power to withdraw permitted development rights where there is a real and specific threat to amenity. These arrangements are designed to help the operators to fulfil their respective obligations efficiently; they have generally worked satisfactorily for many years, and my right hon. Friend sees no reason to change them.

Radioactive Uranium, Feltham

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement in respect of the radioactive uranium deposit found in a warehouse belonging to the Richmond Metal Company, in an industrial estate at Feltham, Middlesex on 13 October.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: During sorting of metal scrap at Richmond Metals on 13 October 1989, a small bar of unusually heavy metal was found which was suspected to be uranium. Checks with a radiation detector showed that the radioactive content was small and there was no hazard. Subsequent checks have confirmed that the bar is uranium.

Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and the Health and Safety Executive are investigating how the uranium came to be on the premises of the Richmond Metal Company.

Genetically Manipulated Organisms

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many responses were made to his Department's consultation paper entitled, "Proposals for Additional Legislation on the International Release of Genetically Manipulated Organisms", and if he will make them available for public inspection.

Mr. Trippier: A total of 61 responses were received, of which 42 have been placed in the Department's library, where they are available for public inspection. Those which have not been deposited were from organisations or individuals who did not indicate their agreement to making their comments publicly available.

Water Companies

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the names, occupations and salaries of the board members of the 10 water holding companies.

Mr. Chris Patten [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The information requested is set out below for the 9 water plcs in England. Appointments to Welsh Water plc are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will ensure that right hon. and hon. Members are informed by the appropriate public bodies or agencies when it is known that toxic waste is unlawfully or improperly imported into their constituencies.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 24 October 1989]: The Government are committed to the principle that the public should have right of access to information held by pollution control authorities. Our proposals for forthcoming legislation include enhanced duties on waste regulation authorities to make information available. It is for the authorities to assess for themselves what information to publish in respect of alleged improprieties in the import of toxic waste.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Young People (Income Support)

Ms. Short To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether a young person under the age of 18 years who applies to his Department for income support on the grounds that a suitable YTS place was not available, and this situation is verified by the careers service, and the young person expresses willingness to enter a suitable place, will be granted income support either during or after he has exhausted any entitlement to bridging allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs Gillian Shephard: The Training Agency is committed and able to provide suitable places for all young people genuinely interested in participating in YTS. There is generally no question of income support being paid on the ground of non-availability of YTS places.

If the careers service finds that a particular young person cannot be offered a suitable YTS place it will contact the local Training Agency office. Training agents have the authority and resources to seek additional places, and to make these available as a matter of urgency.

If, exceptionally, any young person is registered for a YTS place but is not able to start immediately, he or she may claim income support and be considered under the normal provisions including, if appropriate, the discretionary power to direct payment of benefit if that is the only means of preventing severe hardship. If a young person is entitled to income support he or she may receive it in addition to any YTS bridging allowance payable. If bridging allowance is exhausted, or not in payment for some other reason, income support may be paid alone. Young people with housing costs can also receive housing benefit.

Loans and Grants

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total number, and percentage of (a) budgeting loans and (b) community care grants awarded to the 15 client groups defined by his Department for each of his Department's local offices in Doncaster and Wath-on-Dearne, for the financial year 1988-89.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 15 June 1989 at columns 529-30. These have now been confirmed as final figures.

Unemployment Benefit

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether claimants in receipt of unemployment benefit are entitled to undertake training or courses of education as long at they are available for work; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Claimants in receipt of unemployment benefit are required to be both available for work and actively seeking employment. This need not prevent them from undertaking training or courses of education. Regard is had to time spent in participating in any course of vocational training or study in deciding whether a claimant has shown that he is actively seeking employment. This arrangement recognises the worthwhile efforts of many claimants to make good use of their time whilst unemployed. Nonetheless, any claimant pursuing such an activity must organise his affairs in such a way that he can make adequate efforts to seek paid employment.

Crisis Loans

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department has figures of the number of crisis loans refused on the basis of inability to repay the loan.

Mr. Scott: There were provisionally 1,600 refusals in the period April 1989 to September 1989 representing 0·65 per cent. of all decisions.

War Pensions

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give for each of the years 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1987-88 the figures for the overspend which occurred on war pensions.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is as follows:

	Grant £'000	Expenditure £'000	Overspend £'000
1984-85	543,700	544,205	505
1985-86	568,000	581,256	13,256
1987-88	594,000	598,570	4,570

War Widows

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give for the latest year for which records exist and for each of the preceding three years the number of war widows who have died in that year.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The numbers are as follows:

	Numbers
1985	3,407
1986	3,290
1987	3,193
1988	3,098

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give, for the latest full year for which records exist, and for 1973, the number of those (a) under 65 years, (b) between 65 and 69 years, (c) between 70 and 79 years and (d) 80 years and over designated as war widows.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is as follows:

Age group	31 December 1973	31 December 1988
Under 65	36,817	8,745
65 to 69	12,461	8,245
70 to 79	38,695	25,129
80 and over	8,208	15,431

Mrs. C. Halvey

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will request the Attendance Allowance Board to reply without further delay to the hon. Member for Caerphilly's correspondence to them of 15 May, concerning Mrs. C. Halvey of 29 Heolddu Grove, Barfold.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 19 October]: I understand that the board's reply was sent to the hon. Member on 20 October.

HEALTH

Blood Donor Sessions

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) in what circumstances blood donor sessions may be conducted by nurse managers rather than by doctors; and whether his Department has issued any guidance to regional health authorities on the subject;

(2) whether he will issue guidance to all regional health authorities that blood donor sessions should take place only when an appropriately qualified doctor is in attendance;

(3) which regional health authorities have replaced medical officers managing blood donor sessions by specially trained nurses; and what representations he has received about possible risks associated with this change.

Mr. Freeman: At present North East Thames is the only regional health authority in which specially trained nurse managers are in charge of blood donor sessions. In this region there is no doctor present at a session, but there is immediate access to medical advice. This method of work began as a detailed pilot trial in April 1985. At that time the Department's advisory committee on the national blood transfusion service (ACNBTS) studied the detailed protocol for the scheme and the results of the trial, and its representatives, along ith 20 independent assessors, looked at the procedure in practice. The ACNBTS decided that the new procedure presented no risks to donors, and Ministers have received no representations to the contrary since the end of the trial. Any decision to implement the procedure in another regional transfusion centre would be for the region to make, in consultation with the national director of the national blood transfusion service.

Mike Heaffey Centre

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from the Association for Spinal Injury Research Rehabilitation and Reintegration with regard to financial support for the Mike Heaffey Centre for people with disabilities; whether his Department is now willing to give financial support for this project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: We have been informed by the association of the financial circumstances of the Mike Heaffey centre. The question of making good the shortfall in construction costs of the centre is a matter for the association to negotiate with the bodies concerned.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the progress in the establishment of local health pay arrangements to cover payment by student nurses of the poll tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: It is for nursing students themselves to make arrangements to pay the personal community charge for which they are liable. Project 2000 students will pay only 20 per cent. of the community charge, like other full-time students.

GP Operations

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the number of family practitioners within the Trent regional health authority who carry out minor operations performed within their practice and such other relevant information as is available.

Mr. Mellor: No information is available about minor operations carried out by GPs in the Trent region. However, research studies suggest that about 27 per cent. of GPs in England and Wales provide this service from within their practice on a regular basis.

Resource Management Initiative Scheme

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement in respect of (a) the pilot resource management initiative at the Pilgrim hospital, Boston, (b) the ICL's financial system case mix finance module installed in all departments at the hospital and (c) what results to date have been obtained at the five other pilot sites of the Government's resource management initiative scheme.

Mr. Freeman: The RMI seeks improvements in patient care by involving clinicians and other health professionals more closely in the management of their hospitals and supporting this with accurate, timely and credible information from a computerised database which links activity and cost at patient level.

The Pilgrim hospital, Boston, has been a pilot site for the resource management initiative (RMI) since April 1988. Good progress has been made. A number of experiments are under way to determine appropriate management structures for the hospital in line with the objectives of the RMI. Computer systems are being expanded and upgraded and new systems installed where a need can be shown for them.

The ICL case-mix finance reporting module is not installed in the Pilgrim hospital.

As a result of the work done at the pilot sites since the RMI was launched in 1986 we remain convinced that it holds the potential for significantly improving the quality and quantity of health care which the NHS provides.

NHS Property Sales

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will show, by regional health authority, the response received to date from general practitioners, by percentage, where health centres and clinics are proposed to be sold; and what terms and conditions will be implemented.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is not held centrally.

Drugs Prescriptions

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what checks are carried out by inspectors on family practitioners who have dispensing facilities for drugs attached to their surgeries to ensure that abuses are not occurring, especially in respect of receptionists dispensing drugs on repeat prescriptions before they are signed and authorised by the family practitioner.

Mr. Mellor: There are no formal inspection arrangements for family practitioners who have dispensing facilities attached to their surgeries, beyond those provided for under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 in relation to controlled drugs. General medical practitioners are required by their terms of service to ensure that only properly signed and authorised prescriptions are dispensed.

NHS Income Generation

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what feasibility studies have been set up, and what results obtained, in respect of managerial income generation, by regional health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Since the coming into effect of section 7 of the Health and Medicines Act 1988, all health authorities have the legal means, and have been encouraged to seek ways in which they may develop secondary sources of income to enhance and improve patient care, provided that any such scheme does not act to the detriment of patients themselves.

Returns for the initial period of the income generation initiative reveal that during the tax year 1988-89, the net profit to English health authorities was close to £10 million.

Doncaster AHA (Staffing)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the qualified staffing per resident population in the Doncaster area health authority; and what is the national figure.

Mr. Mellor: At 30 September 1988 there were 9·4 qualified doctors and dentists and 51·9 qualified nursing and midwifery staff in the NHS in England per 10,000 resident population. The figures for Doncaster health authority were 4·1 and 55 respectively.

The Doncaster figures for doctors and dentists are not directly comparable with the national figures, because they do not include consultants and senior registrars working in the district whose contracts are held by Trent regional health authority.

Information on other professionally qualified staff could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Nurse Regradings

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many nurses employed by Liverpool area health authority have appealed against their regrading; and how many appeals are still outstanding;

(2) how many nurses' regrading appeals have now been heard by health authorities in England; and if he will list the numbers still outstanding in each authority.

Mr. Mellor: We do not collect centrally information on the number of appeals to district health authorities.

Local Health Services (Liverpool)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many new patients were treated by Broadgreen hospital's accident and emergency unit in the last year; and what consultation has taken place with consultants working in the unit about its future.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold information centrally about the number of new patients treated at the unit. The future of the unit, along with plans for the development of other health services locally, is a matter for the health authority concerned. The hon. Member may wish, therefore, to contact the chairman of the Liverpool health authority.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on future geriatric provision by Liverpool area health authority;

(2) if he will make a statement on the future of Olive Mount hospital, Liverpool;

(3) if he will make a statement on the future of the accident and emergency unit at Broadgreen hospital, Liverpool.

Mr. Mellor: The planning and development of health services locally is a matter for the health authority concerned. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the Liverpool health authority.

Tranquilliser Advice Centre

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Government will fund centrally Tranx (UK) Ltd, the national tranquilliser advice centre, to prevent its imminent closure due to funding problems.

Mr. Freeman: Between 1983 and 1986 Tranx (Harrow) received grants of over £90,000 from the Department's central funding initiative. At the time, it was made clear that these grants were for a maximum of three years and that once central funding ended, organisations would need to look to their local statutory authorities for continued support. For the last three years Tranx (UK) has been funded by the North West Thames regional health authority and the London boroughs grants unit (LBGU). But earlier this year when Tranx (UK) was experiencing financial difficulities, the Department, exceptionally, made a further £10,000 available to clear the organisation's deficit in 1988-89.

Discussions on future funding of Tranx (UK) are still in progress with a variety of potential funders. No decision has yet been reached, but we hope that Tranx (UK) will be able to continue its work with tranquilliser dependents.

Clinical Psychologists

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of posts for clinical psychologists in the National Health Service is currently unfilled.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold this information centrally.

Coronary Heart Disease

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what new initiatives he is considering to combat coronary heart disease.

Mr. Mellor: We are considering a number of initiatives at present, and I refer my hon. Friend to the Government's response to the Committee of Public Accounts report on coronary heart disease (Cm. 831) for further details.

Safety (Damages)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce legislation to permit the imposing of punitive damages on companies which have demonstrated a reckless disregard for human life, with the money raised to go to a fund to promote safety in all aspects of human activity.

Mr. Freeman: We would be prepared to consider any specific examples which may be brought to our attention.

Residential Homes

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many mentally ill and handicapped people live in residential homes and hostels in England and Wales.

Mr. Freeman: Comprehensive information is not available in the form requested. Information on the number of places in local authority, voluntary and private homes at 31 March 1987 is published in "Residential Accommodation for Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped People: Number of Local Authority, Voluntary and Private Homes and Places: England", a copy of which is in the Library. Provisional information for 1988 is as follows:

	Number of places
Homes and hostels for mentally handicapped people	28,458
Homes and hostels for mentally ill people	9,745

Information for Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many physically handicapped people aged under 65 years live in residential homes in England and Wales.

Mr. Freeman: Comprehensive information is not available in the form requested. At 31 March 1988, there were 11,691 persons aged under 65 in local authority and registered residential care homes for elderly people and younger physically handicapped people. This figure is provisional.

Information for Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

One-Parent Families

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of one-parent families recorded in England and Wales.

Mr. Freeman: The best available recent estimate of the number of one-parent families is that of 1,010 thousand in Great Britain in 1986. This was given in an article in Population Trends 55—which is in the Library. The article explains the definition used and the qualifications to be attached to the accuracy of such estimates. It is thought that, of this total, about 100,000 families are in Scotland with the balance of about 910,000 families in England and Wales.

Institutions

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of persons aged over 75 years live in institutions in England and Wales.

Mr. Freeman: Comprehensive information about persons aged over 75 years in institutions is not collected centrally.

At 31 March 1988 there were 188,929 people aged 75 and over resident in local authority and registered residential care homes for elderly and younger physically handicapped people. This represents 5·9 per cent. of the population aged 75 and over. The figure is provisional.

Information for Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that Bradford community health council and other community health councils receive free copies of the two documents referred to in his Department's press release, issued on 29 September, ref: 89/417; and if he will further ensure that community health councils continue to receive free copies of such documents.

Mr. Freeman: The two documents referred to in the press release gave detailed guidance to health service managers on certain aspects of proposals set out in "Working for Patients". It was not felt that the material needed to be brought to the attention of all CHCs, although the association of CHCs in England and Wales was sent copies. In view of Bradford CHC's interest in these particular documents I have arranged for it to receive copies. Decisions on the distribution of further documents to CHCs will be made in the light of their contents.

Drax Power Station

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will order an immediate investigation by his Department into the effects on health of sewage bacteria contamination from the Drax power station.

Mr. Freeman: Thorough investigations are already being undertaken by the appropriate health and local authorities in conjunction with the public health laboratory service. The evidence so far indicates that the potential risk to public health is extremely small. No consequent illness has been reported. Investigations are continuing and I have asked to be kept informed.

Patients

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average number of patients on a general practitioner's list.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) yesterday.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Namibia

16. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent support Her Majesty's Government have given to the United Nations in implementing resolution 435 in Namibia.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have already informed the House of our substantial financial and material contribution to the United Nations transition assistance group. We are now helping with the elections themselves. We have made available an election consultant, we are transporting the ballot papers, and we are sending a group of over 40 election supervisors.

52. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the peace process in Namibia.

58. Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current steps in the independence process in Namibia.

Mr. Waldegrave: Implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibian independence is proceeding well. We will continue to support the United Nations' efforts to ensure that the elections are free and fair, and to assist in a peaceful transition to independence.

United States of America

17. Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to visit the United States of America.

Mr. Major: I visited the United States twice last month. Plans for my next visit are not yet firm.

36. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what subjects he expects to discuss at his next meeting with representatives of the Government of the United States of America.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs visited the United States last month. His next discussions with representatives of the United States Government are likely to cover the usual broad range of issues.

59. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met representatives of the United States Government; and what was discussed.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs last met representatives of the United States Government on 26 September, in the margins of the United Nations General Assembly, in New York. He discussed a wide range of issues.

Cambodia

18. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to have any contact with the Phnom Penh-based Administration in Cambodia.

Mr. Sainsbury: No, Sir.

34. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's relationship with Cambodia.

Mr. Sainsbury: We want to see a free and independent Cambodia in which the people can elect a Government of their own choice. We are actively helping in the search for a political settlement to this end. We have no dealings with the regime installed in Phnom Penh by force of Vietnamese arms.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his present policy towards the people and Government of Cambodia; and what help is being given by the United Kingdom to assist them in their battle with Pol Pot.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have no dealings with the Heng Samrin regime, installed by force of Vietnamese arms. We continue to help those in need within Cambodia through our contributions to humanitarian projects. The best way to keep out the Khmer Rouge is a comprehensive political settlement which enables the Cambodian people to elect a Government of their choice.

Foreign Affairs Council

19. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what subjects he expects to raise at the next meeting of the European Community Foreign Affairs Council.

Mr. Maude: I expect a range of Community issues to be discussed.

Lebanon

20. Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals Her Majesty's Government and her EEC partners have put forward to resolve the conflict in Lebanon.

Mr. Waldegrave: We, together with our European partners, continue to support fully the Arab League committee of three heads of state in their efforts to bring peace to Lebanon. We welcome the agreement reached at Ta'if by the Lebanese parliamentary deputies.

NATO Information Budget

21. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current NATO information budget; what it was in real terms five, 10 and 15 years ago; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The forecast 1989 NATO budget is £1,160 million; it was £730 million five years ago; £281 million 10 years ago and £409 million 15 years ago. All figures are in 1988 prices.

Middle East

22. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the peace process in the middle east.

Mr. Waldegrave: We fully support Egyptian efforts to seek clarification of Mr. Shamir's useful elections proposal and to promote talks in Cairo between the Israeli Government and Palestinians from inside and outside the occupied territories. We look to Israel to respond positively.

Overseas Visits

23. Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the overseas venues he has visited since becoming Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Major: Since becoming Foreign Secretary, I have visited:

Paris—for the International Conference on Cambodia.
Washington—for discussion with the Administration and Congress.
New York on two occasions—to address the Economic Club and the UN General Assembly.
Bonn—for talks with the German Foreign Minister.
Luxembourg—for a meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council.
Chartres—for an Informal Meeting of EC Foreign Ministers.
Kuala Lumpur—for the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting.

Detained Britons (Consular Assistance)

24. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, how many British citizens were detained abroad in 1988; how many of these received consular assistance; and what were the comparable figures for five years ago.

Mr. Sainsbury: One thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven British citizens were reported as having been detained abroad during 1988. Those detained briefly for minor offences are often not reported to us. Consular assistance was available to all who were still in detention when consular contact was established.

Comparable figures for five years ago are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Hungary

25. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will report on the current state of European Community-Hungary relations.

Mr. Waldegrave: EC-Hungary relations are excellent, with both parties committed to the development of closer ties through the trade and economic co-operation agreement signed last September. The Community will also be assisting Hungary's economic reform efforts through vocational training and by providing technical assistance in agriculture and the environment.

Horn of Africa

26. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in the Horn of Africa.

Mr. Waldegrave: The situation remains disturbed with continuing internal conflicts and reports of violations of human rights. There have, however, been some positive developments including the initiation of negotiations between the Ethiopian Government and the Eritrean People's Liberation Front, and the release of a number of political prisoners in Ethiopia and Somalia.

Vietnam

27. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans Her Majesty's Government have to review their relations with Vietnam; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: We keep our relations with Vietnam under regular review.

EC Social Charter

28. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with M. Jacques Delors concerning the social charter.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs discussed the proposed social charter and other current EC issues with his ministerial colleagues and M. Delors at the informal meeting near Chartres on 14-15 October.

European Foreign Policies

29. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next proposes to have discussions with his European Community partners concerning the development of common European foreign policies.

57. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet other EEC Ministers in political co-operation to discuss common foreign policy.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs next expects to meet his EC colleagues to discuss political co-operation matters in Brussels on 27 November. Before then, he expects to see them at the Foreign Affairs Council on 6 November in Brussels, when there may also be an opportunity to discuss political co-operation matters.

Nicaragua

30. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received regarding Her Majesty's Government's relations with Nicaragua.

Mr. Sainsbury: We receive representations on our relations with Nicaragua from a wide variety of sources, including hon. Members and members of the public, non-governmental organisations and the Nicaraguan embassy in London, as well as from the Government and opposition in Nicaragua.

Chile

31. Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of Chile concerning the conditions under which the plebiscite will be held later this year.

Mr. Sainsbury: Plebiscites have been held in Chile most recently on 5 October 1988 and 30 July 1989. Both were conducted in exemplary fashion. There are no plans for any further plebiscites this year.

40. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to encourage the transition to democracy in Chile.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. MacDonald) on 14 June 1989.

Drugs

32. Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on recent progress in the co-ordination of the international fight against drug trafficking.

Mr. Sainsbury: Seventy four states, including the United Kingdom, have now signed the 1988 United Nations convention against illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and pyschotropic substances. The United Kingdom has signed bilateral agreements or arrangements to trace, freeze and confiscate the proceeds of drugs trafficking with 11 countries, the latest with Malaysia on 17 October.

54. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about international efforts to combat drug abuse.

Mr. Sainsbury: Together with other countries the United Kindgom is providing substantial assistance to Colombia. I attended a Caribbean ministerial drugs conference in Kingston from 2-4 October. Drugs were discussed at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Kuala Lumpur. I shall make a statement on United Kingdom drugs policy during the United Nations General Assembly drugs debate 3-7 November. A proposed United Nations special session on drugs is likely to be held early in 1990. The United Kingdom will host an international conference on demand reduction and cocaine in April 1990. We are discussing with our European Community partners ways of improving EC co-ordination on drugs.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the Colombian Government concerning the activities of British mercenaries working for drug barons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs made clear when he met the Colombian Foreign Minister, Sr. Londoño, in New York on 26 September, we condemn unequivocally and unreservedly the activities of those who work for drugs traffickers in Colombia. It is primarily for the Colombian authorities to take action in respect of offences committed in Colombia. We remain in close touch with the Colombian authorities on this issue. President Barco has thanked us for the help which we have extended in this matter.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to help the British dependent territories in their fight against the trade in narcotics.

Mr. Sainsbury: We are very active in assisting local governments in the dependent territories, particularly those in the Caribbean, in their fight against the trade in narcotics. Following a survey of the Caribbean dependent territories conducted in 1986 we took steps to establish or strengthen drugs squads in the local police forces through the provision of United Kingdom personnel and equipment. In addition, a United Kingdom Customs training adviser has been running drugs awareness courses and a United Kingdom drugs intelligence officer has been establishing drugs intelligence registries in each of the territories. A new police launch was provided for the British Virgin Islands Government in 1988 and similar launches will be provided for Anguilla, Montserrat and Turks and Caicos Islands over the next six months. Training for the crews will be given by a United Kingdom team of experts.

In July/August a team of United Kingdom experts completed a further survey of the drugs problem in the Caribbean dependent territories to assess the present situation and to make recommendations for further action. We are currently considering this report in consultation with our Governors and local administrations.

Refuseniks

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the Government's representations on behalf of refuseniks.

Mr. Waldegrave: We continue to take every opportunity to press the Soviet authorities both about individual refusenik cases, and on the need for new and effective legislation which will make the refusenik problem a thing of the past.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Russian authorities about the case of Norbet and Natasha Magazanik and their daughter Olga and son Alexander of Moscow.

Mr. Waldegrave: We take every opportunity to press the Soviet authorities on individual refusenik cases such as the Magazanik family. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs raised this case most recently with Mr. Shevardnadze in New York on 29 September. We shall maintain our pressure until this case is satisfactorily resolved.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Russian authorities about the case of Alexander and Yelena Rappoport and his son Vladimir of Moscow.

Mr. Waldegrave: We take every opportunity to press the Soviet authorities on individual cases such as Alexander and Elena Rappoport. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs raised this case most recently when he met Mr. Shevardnadze in New York on 29 September. We shall maintain our pressure until this case is satisfactorily resolved.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations have been made to the Russian authorities about the case of Irina Tiomkinal, her son Ilya and her mother, of Moscow;

(2) what representations have been made to the Russian authorities about the case of Roman and Ludmilla Friedman and their sons Igor and Andre of Moscow;

(3) what representations have been made to the Russian authorities about the case of Yakov Grinberg and Basya Berelisovna and their daughter Diana and son Lev of Moscow.

(4) what representations have been made to the Russian authorities about the case of Semion and Lida Akselrod and their sons Boris, Benjamin and David of Leningrad.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have not previously raised these particular cases with the Soviet authorities but we will be happy to do so if the hon. Member will provide the necessary details about each case.

Central America

35. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Government of the United States to discuss progress in the Central American peace process.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have regular discussions with the United States Administration on a wide range of issues, including Central America.

Human Rights

37. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the further progress required of the Soviet Union towards implementing its human rights commitment for United Kingdom attendance at the proposed Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe human rights conference in Moscow in September 1991 to take place.

Mr. Waldegrave: While there have been significant improvements in Soviet human rights performance, many individual cases remain unresolved, and most of the expected new legislation is still unpublished. There is still much to be done before our well-known conditions for attendance are met. The refusal of a visa recently to the Reverend Michael Bordeaux was not a good omen.

Somalia

38. Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information the Government now have about the outcome of their representations on human rights in Somalia.

Mr. Waldegrave: Earlier in the year the Somali Government released hundreds of political prisoners and received a visit by an Amnesty International delegation. These welcome moves were followed in mid-July by the brutal suppression of demonstrations and extra-judicial executions. We have made clear our deep concern about these developments.

China

39. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of China; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met the Chinese Foreign Minister, Mr. Qian Qichen, in New York on 28 September. Their discussion concentrated on Hong Kong. They agreed on the need for co-operation to implement the Joint Declaration and the need to work for the restoration of confidence in Hong Kong.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the ban on arms sales to China includes equipment for which export licences had been granted prior to the ban but which has not left the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maude: Yes.

India

41. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement concerning Britain's relations with India.

Mr. Sainsbury: Our relations with India are close and friendly and reflect the many points of contact and common interest between us.

British Tourists (Injuries)

42. Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many cases have been reported to date of British tourists being injured in (a) accidents, (b) assaults and (c) civil disturbances whilst on overseas holidays since the beginning of the year.

Mr. Sainsbury: British missions overseas received reports of 527 accidents and 225 assaults of which British nationals were victims between 1 January 1989 and 30 September 1989. Statistics on the numbers injured in civil disturbances are not held.

Romania

43. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what new initiatives he plans to reduce the violations of human rights in Romania.

Mr. Waldegrave: We will continue to protest strongly to the Romanian Government on every appropriate occasion about violations of human rights in Romania.

Pakistan

44. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Anglo-Pakistani relations.

Mr. Sainsbury: Britian and Pakistan's traditionally close and friendly relations have been reinforced by the restoration of democracy in Pakistan last year and, more recently, by Pakistan's resumption this month of Commonwealth membership. The warmth of the relationship was demonstrated by the very successful visit of Prime Minister Bhutto in July.

South Africa

45. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what role he proposes the United Kingdom should play in the ending of apartheid in South Africa.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is not for outsiders to try to impose a solution on South Africa. Our role will continue to be to help and encourage those who are working for peaceful change; meanwhile maintaining dialogue with the South African Government in order to reinforce its stated commitment to reform and negotiations.

El Salvador

46. Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Government of El Salvador to discuss the human rights situation in that country.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has not yet had the opportunity to meet members of the Government of El Salvador.

Human rights in El Salvador was among the subjects I discussed with the Salvadorean Foreign Minister, Dr. Manuel Pacas, on 26 September.

Hong Kong

47. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with counterparts from other Commonwealth countries regarding the future of Hong Kong.

48. Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met representatives of the Government of China to discuss the future of Hong Kong.

Mr. Maude: The future of Hong Kong has been discussed at the European Community Council in Madrid, at the Economic Summit in Paris in July, and the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in Kuala Lumpur this month.

In addition my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has had meetings with the Chinese Foreign Minister in Paris on 31 July and in New York on 28 September.

Mr. Roger Cooper

49. Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the continued detention in Iran of Mr. Roger Cooper and his Department's efforts to secure Mr. Cooper's release.

Mr. Waldegrave: Roger Cooper has been held in prison in Iran, without adequate consular access, since December 1985. We regard his detention as wholly unjustified, and have made our concerns clear to the Iranian Government both directly and indirectly on many occasions. We shall continue to take every opportunity to press for his release.

Macao

50. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implications of Portugal's decision to grant full citizenship and right of abode to the people of Macao.

Mr. Maude: There has been no such decision. Portugal grants automatic full citizenship and right of abode only to people born in Portuguese territory of Portuguese parents. The 1981 Portuguese Nationality Act ended the automatic right to Portuguese nationality of children born of non-Portuguese parents in Macao. It is estimated that less than 20 per cent. of Macao residents have the right of abode in Portugal.

Entry Clearance Interviews (Islamabad)

51. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he proposes to reduce delays for those awaiting entry clearance interviews at the British embassy in Islamabad.

Mr. Sainsbury: Waiting times for interview at the High Commission in Islamabad have been reduced this year following an increase in the number of permanent entry clearance staff and streamlining of procedures. We continue to monitor queue lengths to ensure that applicants are seen as quickly as resources allow.

Indian High Commissioner

53. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Indian high commissioner; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met the Indian high commissioner socially with other members of the diplomatic corps on 14 September. My noble Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has had substantive discussions on a full range of issues.

Kurdish People

55. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Iraq concerning their treatment of Kurdish people.

Mr. Waldegrave: We regularly make clear to the Iraqi Government at all levels our concern over Iraq's human rights record, including its treatment of its Kurdish population.

Bangladesh

56. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Foreign Minister of Bangladesh and what was discussed.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and the Foreign Minister of Bangladesh both participated in the recent Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Kuala Lumpur.

Afghanistan

60. Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards Afghanistan.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have consistently supported efforts to replace the present regime in Kabul with a truly representative government acceptable to the majority of Afghans. This is the necessary preliminary to any lasting settlement and to the voluntary return of Afghan refugees.

Kampuchea

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance the British Government are giving to the republic of Kampuchea to avoid a renewal of civil war in that country.

Mr. Sainsbury: We do not provide aid to the Heng Samrin regime, which was installed by force of Vietnamese arms. But we have contributed towards a number of humanitarian projects inside Cambodia. Our objective remains a comprehensive political settlement which would enable the Cambodian people to elect a Government of their choice.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what stance the British delegation to the United Nations intends to take to the possible renewal of representation of Kampuchea by the coalition Government of democratic Kampuchea.

Mr. Sainsbury: On 17 October the UN General Assembly once again adopted, without a vote, the report of the credentials committee. This recommended, inter alia, acceptance of the credentials of Democratic Kampuchea. After adoption, the United Kingdom representative emphasised that this should not be taken to imply support for the Khmer Rouge and made clear our abhorrence of Pol Pot.

Prisoners of War

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will reconsider the claims made by ex-prisoners of war, who were involved in the building of the Siam to Burma railway in 1941, in relation to their treatment by the Japanese at that time.

Mr. Sainsbury: No. The question of compensation for the suffering and damage caused by Japan during the war was dealt with in the 1951 treaty of peace with Japan. While recognising the very great debt owed by this country to those who fought against the Japanese, there are no grounds to reopen the issue now.

Israel

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Government of Israel on human rights, and the continued occupation of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs discussed the situation in the occupied territories with the Israeli Foreign Minister on 25 September and underlined our concern that, pending their withdrawal, the Israelis should administer the territories in accordance with international law and their human rights obligations.

United Nations

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what matters he proposes to raise at the next meeting of the United Nations General Assembly.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs attended the opening session of the forty-fourth session of the General Assembly between 25 and 29 September. This provided him with an opportunity to deliver a statement to the General Assembly, have formal meetings with the Secretary-General, Senor Perez de Cuellar and the newly elected President of the General Assembly, Mr. Garba, and to attend a lunch hosted by the Secretary-General for the Foreign Ministers of the five permanent members of the Security Council.

My right hon. Friend also undertook bilateral discussions with the President of Colombia, President Barco and the Foreign Ministers of the following countries:

USA (Mr. Baker)
USSR (Mr. Shevardnadze)
China (Mr. Qian)
Japan (Mr. Nakayama)
Hungary (Dr. Horn)
Israel (Mr. Arens)
Poland (Professor Skubiszewski)
Pakistan (Mr. Yaqub Khan).

My right hon. Friend does not expect to attend the General Assembly again this session. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister intends to address the General Assembly on 8 November on environmental issues.

Victim Support Groups

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has plans to co-ordinate victim support groups in other EC states for United Kingdom citizens; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I have been asked to reply.

The United Kingdom participated in work which led to the adoption in 1987 by the Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers of a recommendation on assistance to victims and the prevention of victimisation. This recommendation urged the Governments of all member states (including European Community and other member states) to take a range of steps to support victims in their own countries.

So far as co-ordination is concerned, we have encouraged and assisted Victim Support—an independent national body which receives a grant from the Home Office—in its contacts with victim support groups elsewhere in Europe.

EMPLOYMENT

Employment Training

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, for the latest available date (a) the number of starts on employment training, (b) how many were people with disabilities, (c) (b) as a percentage of (a), (d) total employment training starts under the special groups exemption, (e) how many, of (d), were people wth disabilities, (f) (e) as a percentage of (d), and (g) the sources of referral.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls: To 13 October 1989, the latest date for which information is available, 468,000 people had started on employment training. An analysis of individual trainee records received relating to starts up to the end of June show that about 11 per cent. were people who stated that they had a disability or health problem which affected the type of work they could do. The same analysis shows that training agents and training managers had coded about 23 per cent. of entrants in the special eligibility exemption groups. Of these special group entrants about 16 per cent. were people who stated that they had a disability or a health problem which affected the type of work they could do. The source of referral for most people on employment training is the employment service. In addition some trainees are directly recruited by training agents and training managers.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish up-to-date figures for Great Britain and each training agency region for each month since September 1988, the number of (a) entrants to employment training, (b) people receiving employment training allowances, (c) employment training special group starts, separately for skill shortage and labour market schemes, (d) employment training leavers and (e) employment training leavers who left before completing their action plan.

Mr. Nicholls: As the information requested is contained in a number of tables, I will write to the hon. Member.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish up-to-date figures for Great Britain and each training agency region for each month since September 1988, the number of (a) filled places in employment training; (b) employment training trainees on work placements with employers and (c) employment training trainees on project-based placements.

Mr. Nicholls: The figures requested for filled places are given in table 1. Information about the number of trainees on practical training placements with employers and on projects on any one day is collected from quarterly census returns submitted by training managers. This information is available for 30 December 1988, 31 March 1989 and 30 June 1989; these figures are given in table 2.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for Great Britain and each standard Training Agency region, what are the latest available statistics for employment training giving a breakdown of entrants which shows how many were male and female, the length of time they had been out of work, their ethnic backgrounds and whether or not they had any disabilities.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is provided in the following table:

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, for Great Britain and each standard Training Agency region, what are the latest available statistics for employment training showing the number of trainees in each monthly period who (a) have entered employer-based work placements and the cumulative total of how many are in employer placements at the latest available date and (b) the number of trainees in each monthly period who entered project-based work placements and the cumulative total of how many are in project-based placements at the latest available date.

Mr. Nicholls: Information about the number of trainees on practical training placements with employers and on projects on any one day is collected from quarterly census returns submitted by training managers. This information is available for 30 December 1988, 31 March 1989 and 30 June 1989. These figures are given in the following table.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has about trainees who leave employment training early; and what is the latest available monthly estimate of the number of trainees who have left employment training early.

Mr. Nicholls: Information on trainees who leave employment training early is not currently available.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps are being taken to improve administrative arrangements in employment training.

Mr. Eggar: The forms and procedures involved in the delivery of employment training are kept under review. The objective is to satisfy the requirements of public accountability and good administration whilst minimising the burden on training agents and training managers.

All ET forms (and the guidance notes associated with them) have now been reviewed. In many cases they have been simplified, and the revised forms introduced progressively since March. Currently we are taking steps to improve the trainee attendance records for the payment of training grants and trainee allowances. We are also improving arrangements for notifying termination of training.

I am confident that the overall effect of the action we are taking will be to ease administrative burdens while ensuring the proper use of Exchequer funds.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the most recent details of (a) the number of filled places on the 23 large company employment training schemes listed on 27 February, Official Report, column 34, (b) any changes to the maximum number of places allocated for each of those schemes and (c) which of those schemes have since withdrawn from employment training.

Mr. Nicholls [holding answer 23 October 1989]: The following table updates to 29 September 1989 the details of the 23 large company ET schemes listed in the Official Report on 27 February at column 34. The "Maximum No. of places allocated" column shows, in brackets, the changes to the figures listed in the Official Report.

Restart

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many Restart interviews were conducted in the last 12 months; what numbers were referred to each menu option; what numbers actually took up their referral; what numbers were referred to the unemployment benefit services for non-attendance at interview; what numbers were referred to the unemployment benefit service for non-availability; what numbers were referred to the unemployment benefit services for refusal of suitable employment; and if he will express the numbers as a percentage.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is given in the table.

We do not know how many people ultimately start a job or other opportunity as a result of the Restart interview.

Construction Industry (Accidents)

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received in respect of accidents in the construction industry; and what plans he has to increase protection for those employed in that industry.

Mr. Nicholls: Over the last year I have answered several questions in the House and received letters from hon. Members on this subject. Additionally, the Building Employers Confederation has written to me and last April I met officials of UCATT. The number of Health and Safety Executive (HSE) inspectors devoted to construction has already risen 10 per cent. since 1988, and HSE aims to have 100 construction inspectors by 1990. Inspectors will be paying more attention to the quality of site management and levels of training and supervision. HSE will also continue to advise the industry and to vigorously enforce the law where necessary.

The Government will shortly be making the wearing of safety helmets on construction sites compulsory and the Health and Safety Commission has recently published a consultative document setting out proposals for new regulations to strengthen the management of health and safety on construction sites.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how training and enterprise councils will respond to the specific needs of ethnic businesses within local communities.

Mr. Eggar: Training and enterprise councils will be expected to undertake a comprehensive assessment of local market needs to enable them to draw up their corporate and business plans. Consultation with a wide range of organisations and individuals, including ethnic businesses where appropriate, will be vital to this assessment.

National Council for Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the work being done by the National Council for Vocational Qualifications.

Mr. Eggar: The council's task of rationalising and reforming our vocational qualification system is well under way. Over 160 qualifications have now been accredited within the first four levels of the new national vocational qualification framework.

A new system for recording the achievement of parts or units of the new national vocational qualifications has been developed, which will enable candidates to work more flexibly and progressively through their qualifications. In discussion with relevant professional bodies, the council has also begun to prepare the ground for extending its work to higher-level qualifications.

Details of the council's activities are contained within its second annual report, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Secondary Picketing

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about secondary picketing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls The Government receive representations on various aspects of industrial relations law. Reform of this law since 1979 has given employers, and others, the ability to restrain unlawful secondary picketing. In the last year no formal representations have been received about this particular matter.

Manufacturing (North-West)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his Department's latest assessment of the implications for jobs in the manufacturing sector in the north-west as a result of the introduction of the single market in 1992.

Mr. Eggar: The reduction in barriers to free movement of goods, persons, services, and capital, associated with the completion of the single European market in 1992, will provide considerable trade and employment opportunities in all regions of the United Kingdom. Future jobs growth throughout the United Kingdom depends on how well firms and workers react to these and other opportunities.

Quarterly Attenders

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, at each appropriate quarterly date over the most recent three years, what was the flow of new quarterly attender claimants at the same dates, what was the stock of new quarterly attender claimants; what criteria are used by the employment service in assessing claimants when granting quarterly attender status; what steps a quarterly attender must take to show actively seeking work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Records are not kept on the flow of new quarterly attenders.

The number of quarterly attenders at each appropriate quarter over the last three years was as follows:

	Number
October 1986	297,982
January 1987	292,270
April 1987	281,871
July 1987	269,111
October 1987	266,066
January 1988	257,897
April 1988	257,328
July 1988	248,932
October 1988	241,580
January 1989	222,289
April 1989	206,921
July 1989	183,614

YTS

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, at the end of June, July, August and September how many people of YTS eligible age, registered with jobcentres or the careers service, were awaiting an offer of a YTS place; and of them, how many were receiving bridging allowance or extended child benefit or income support.

Mr. Nicholls: Only local careers services hold information on the total number of young people awaiting the offer of a YTS place. There is no central record.

The numbers of young people receiving bridging allowance was as follows:

	Numbers
8 June	10,310
13 July	10,026
10 August	10,261
14 September	9,110

Extended child benefit was not payable at the end of July or the end of August. The number of young people whose parents were receiving child benefit at the end of June was 8,941 and, at the end of September 15,957.

Information on the number of young people receiving income support is not available.

Adjudication Officers (Decisions)

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, for the 12-month period to the end of June, if he will give the decisions of adjudication officers on doubtful fresh claims, renewal claims and reviewed claims for unemployment benefit showing the numbers allowed, disallowed, referred to a local tribunal, revised in favour of claimants, revised adversely to claimants and not revised in the following categories of questions (a) employed to full normal extent, (b) engaged in employment, (c) availability, (d) restricted availability, (e) leaving voluntarily, (f) for misconduct, (g) neglecting to avail of employment, (h) refusal of employment, (i) refusal or premature termination of training, (j) refusal to carry out written recommendations, and (k) Restart.

Mr. Eggar: All decisions on claims for unemployment benefit are made by the independent adjudication authorities and no statistics are kept as to the manner in which the entitlement doubt arose.

Figures on the number of decisions for failure to attend Restart are not compiled separately.

Subject to these qualifications, the following table sets out the information requested.

Twelve months ended 30 June 1989

Art and Culture

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the level of expenditure by the Training Agency on training in the arts and cultural industries.

Mr. Nicholls: Information is not available in the form requested for all Training Agency programmes. However, in 1989-90 the cost to the Exchequer of YTS training in the arts and related activities is estimated to be around £23 million.

Working Hours

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list for all the member countries of the EEC the average number of working hours per week for (a) 10 years ago (b) five years ago and (c) the latest year for which he has figures.

Mr. Nicholls: Estimates from Community labour force surveys as requested, are shown in the table:

Persons in employment in member countries of the EEC

Local Enterprise Agencies

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how long the Government's local enterprise agency project schemes has been operating; how many projects in Liverpool have received support under the scheme; in which Liverpool constituencies supported schemes have been situated; and what is the total amount of support up to the present time.

Mr. Eggar: The local enterprise agency project scheme (LEAPS) has been in operation since April 1988. Since then six projects in Liverpool have received support. Constituencies in which projects have been or are operating are Liverpool (Riverside), Liverpool (Broad Green), Liverpool (Garston), Liverpool (Mossley Hill), Birkenhead, Wallasey, Wirral West and Wirral South. The total amount of support in Liverpool so far under LEAPS is £38,000 of public money matching an equal private sector contribution. Nationally, around £600,000 has been paid in LEAPS grants since April 1988 on the same basis.

Efficiency Scrutiny

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what topic he proposes for his Department's next efficiency scrutiny.

Mr. Eggar: We have decided to set up an efficiency scrutiny to examine the reasons why some benefit claimants, having expressed an interest in one or more employment and training programme, either fail to take up a place or drop out after a very short time.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many officials in his Department at grade 3 and above have, since promotion to the level of grade 3, attended a course (a) specifically on information technology and (b) containing an element of information technology and what percentage each represents of all the staff in those grades in his Department.

Mr. Eggar [pursuant to his reply, 19 October 1989; c. 233-34.]: I regret that the information given in my original reply was not up-to-date due to staff changes since 16 October. The correct information is given in the following table:

	Number of staff in the grade	Number of staff who have attended courses specifically on information technology	Percentage of staff in the grade	Number of staff who have attended courses with an element of information technology	Percentage of staff in the grade
Grade 1	1	1	100	1	100
Grade 2	5	5	100	1	20
Grade 3	26	10	38	13	50

TRANSPORT

Motorways

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to provide a new service area on the M4 between Heston and Membury.

Mr. Atkins: A service area is needed to fill the 56-mile gap between the sites at Membury and Heston. Consultants have been searching for a suitable site to meet this need. When they have reported and their recommendations have been considered I shall announce our proposals for development.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many objections have been received from (a) organisations and (b) individuals to the revised bridge proposals for the east London river crossing; and whether he intends to reopen the public inquiry into the scheme.

Mr. Portillo: By the end of the statutory objection period, 55 objections and representations had been received from organisations and 3,235 from individuals.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for the Environment announced on 17 October that they had decided to re-open the previous inquiry to consider representations about the change in the design of the Thames bridge and to hold a concurrent inquiry into the draft orders for the revised bridge design. These inquiries will be held jointly with the public inquiry into the planning application to extend the runway and to change the operating conditions at London City airport. These inquiries are expected to be held around the middle of 1990.

Private Hire Cars

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he is currently giving to the introduction of a licensing system for private hire cars in Greater London.

Mr. Portillo: I consider representations as and when they are made to me.

Channel Tunnel Link

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport at what stage British Rail will require formal investment authority for any public investment in a new line to meet the anticipated growth in international traffic after the opening of the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail requires Government approval for significant expenditures.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by what criteria he will judge whether a proposal put to him by British Rail to build a new line to meet the anticipated growth in international traffic after the opening of the Channel tunnel is environmentally satisfactory.

Mr. Portillo: The Government will need to be satisfied that BR has carried out an environmental assessment, and that it can provide a full environmental statement detailing the impact of the works and any mitigation measures. Ultimately it will be for Parliament to judge whether any proposals are environmentally acceptable.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether any proposals have been put to him by British Rail to build a new line to meet the anticipated growth of international traffic after the opening of the Channel tunnel that will run from the tunnel terminal to Swanley only.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail is continuing its discussions with the private sector. No firm proposal has yet been put to Ministers.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether it remains his policy that he will not give his approval to a proposal from British Rail to construct a new railway line between London and the Channel tunnel if the board's proposals, including environmental protection measures, fail to establish a commercial case for the contruction of a new line.

Mr. Portillo: Yes.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether, in calculating the rate of return on any public investment in a new line to meet the anticipated growth in international traffic after the opening of the Channel tunnel, he will take full account of the loss in revenue to British Rail on existing routes arising from the diversion of national and international passengers from existing routes to the new line.

Mr. Portillo: This would be taken into account.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether any proposals have been put to him by British Rail to build a new line to meet the anticipated growth in international traffic after the opening of the Channel tunnel that involve public sector investment in whole or in part.

Mr. Portillo: The basis of British Rail's discussions with the private sector is that the construction and operation of the new line would be a joint venture in which BR would have a minority shareholding.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will direct British Rail that, in its discussions of proposals with the private sector to build a new line to meet the anticipated growth in international traffic after the opening of the Channel tunnel, the proposals are to incorporate as a minimum all those environmental protection works that have been announced by British Rail to date.

Mr. Portillo: I have no powers to give such a direction. I understand that the discussions between British Rail and the private sector have taken full account of BR's progress in designing the route, including environmental protection measures.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Set-aside Payments

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he proposes any change in the amounts payable for set-aside to take account of inflation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) on 27 July 1989 at column 950.

Greenhouse Effect

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what initiatives to combat the greenhouse effect he introduced to the Council of Agriculture Ministers on 25 to 26 September in Brussels.

Mr. Curry: The greenhouse effect was not discussed at this meeting of the Council.

Straw and Stubble Burning

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what guidance his Department has issued to farmers who store straw and stubble in open fields close to public highways and in the vicinity of private property, in respect of height of stack, and closeness to properties to avoid a fire risk.

Mr. Maclean: Officers of my Agricultural Development and Advisory Service will advise farmers on how to store straw in open fields in such a way as to keep to a minimum any possible risks from fire to people, highways and private property.

Organically Grown Grain

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tonnes of organically grown grain have been imported during the current year; and what is the figure for organic grown grain produced in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: This information is not available.

Research Projects

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what rules govern the publication of findings of research projects at his research laboratories; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: When the work has been completed and necessary steps taken to protect intellectual property rights, the findings of research projects at MAFF laboratories are published in appropriate scientific journals. For research funded on a contract basis for an outside customer, the question of publication is a matter for the terms of the individual contract.

Eggs

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the answer given to the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor), Official Report, 20 October, columns 281-82, what percentage of eggs produced for the second quarter of 1989 were classified as free range; and what steps he is taking to encourage free range egg production.

Mr. Curry: Information on free range egg production is available only on an annual basis. In 1988 registered egg packing stations marketed under the description "free range eggs" (as defined in Commission Regulation (EEC) 1943/85) around 796,000 boxes of 360 eggs each. This figure is just under 3 per cent. of the estimated United Kingdom packing station throughput for the same period.

Any encouragement for the expansion of free range egg production must come from the customer rather than the Government.

Battery Fowls

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he proposes to take to protect battery fowls being taken to slaughter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 23 October 1989]: The Farm Animal Welfare Council is currently engaged on a study of transport conditions for poultry and I look forward to receiving its findings. In the meantime the Welfare of Poultry (Transport) Order 1988 contains detailed provisions aimed at protecting the welfare of poultry (including battery hens destined for slaughter) during loading, unloading and carriage. We have also supported the introduction of a welfare guide on handling of end-of-lay hens which the industry has prepared.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Tim Boswell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, what was the outcome of the Brussels Agricultural Council held on 25 and 26 September.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 19 October 1989 c. 210]: I represented the United Kingdom at the 23-24 October 1989 Agriculture Council meeting together with the Parliamentary Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry).

The main items discussed were the proposed reform of the Community's agricultural structures policy, the proposal to increase the Community's milk quota by 1 per cent. subject to certain conditions, proposals to amend the rules for charges on imports of pigmeat into the Community, proposals to allow additional coresponsibility levy charged on cereals to be amended after an initial harvest determination by the Commission in the light of further information, and proposed regulations governing veterinary checks on intra-Community trade. On all these points I argued strongly the well-established United Kingdom position. The President indicated that he hoped that conclusions could be reached on some or all of these issues at the November Council on the basis of a compromise proposal he expected to put forward.

The Council also discussed the proposed Council directive concerning the protection of water against nitrate pollution on which the Environment Council takes the lead. I pointed out that this proposal had to take better account of the potential effects on agriculture, and in particular that any restraints ultimately imposed must be proportionate to the benefits gained by reducing pollution, as is required by the EEC Treaty.

Decisions were reached on the consumption aid for olive oil for 1989-90 at the same level as applied in the previous marketing year and on extensions of less favoured areas in three member states and on a national aid for wine production in Rheinland Pfalz.

DEFENCE

Low Flying

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many training air-miles were flown at under 500 feet altitude over national parks during the months of July, August and September.

Mr. Neubert: Central records are not held in a form which would enable the information requested to be provided.

RAF Mildenhall (Pollution)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he takes to ensure that the United States Air Force management of RAF Mildenhall in Suffolk complies with standards set by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in regard to off-site discharges of (a) raw sewage into the river Lark, (b) chlorinated solvents, (c) mercury, and (d) cadmium; and if he will make a statement on off-site discharges of polluting chemicals from RAF Mildenhall in relation to EEC environmental directives.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The management and operation of the RAF Mildenhall sewage treatment plant is the responsibility of the Property Services Agency. Discharges from the plant are checked by both the PSA and the National Rivers Authority to ensure compliance with standards agreed between both parties. Mercury and cadmium are not used at the base, and any chlorinated solvents are collected after use and are not discharged into the sewers. It is the Government's policy to ensure that the requirements of EC environmental directives are fully complied with. Discharges from RAF Mildenhall meet these requirements.

Aldermaston and Burghfield

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what programmes have been implemented to aid staff recruitment and retention at AWE Aldermaston and at AWE Burghfield since 21 June; and what programmes it is envisaged will be implemented at these establishments over the course of the next two years.

Mr. Neubert: A number of measures to improve recruitment and retention at AWE (Aldermaston) and AWE (Burghfield) have been pursued vigorously for some time. These have been further assisted by introduction from 1 October 1989 of further enhancement to special pay additions for those categories of staff for which recruitment and retention needs are greatest. Recruitment campaigns are continuing, and the situation for the future will be kept under review.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when it is now expected that the A90 building at AWE Aldermaston will reach its full production capacity.

Mr. Neubert: Production in A90 will reach its peak by the mid-1990s.

Women Pensioners

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give for the latest year for which figures are available and the preceding three years the number of women in receipt of attributable family forces pensions who died during the year.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is not directly available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Recruitment Offices

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the latest estimate of the value of the buildings owned by Her Majesty's Government and operated as armed services recruitment offices in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: This information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Family Forces Pensions

Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the purpose of the attributable family forces pensions.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Attributable forces family pensions arise from the provisions of the occupational pension schemes for members of the armed forces, as amended in 1973. These amended provisions applied to personnel who gave service on or after 31 March 1973. The family pensions provide an appropriate element of income for the eligible widows and dependent children of those service personnel whose cause of death, whether in service or in retirement, is recognised as being attributable to their service in the armed forces. The provisions were intended, as far as practicable, to place service families in an overall position broadly comparable with those of other public servants whose death occurs as a direct consequence of their employment.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give for each of the years 1976, 1979, 1982, 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988 the number of widows in receipt of attributable forces family pension.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is not directly available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Written Answers to Questions

CIVIL SERVICE

Race Relations

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service how many Civil Service appointments have been made since 1979 under section 5(2) of the Race Relations Act 1976; and how many posts within the Civil Service are designated under section 5(2) of the Act.

Mr. Luce: No appointments to the Civil Service have been made under section 5(2) of the Race Relations Act 1976; there are no posts within the Civil Service designated under section 5(2) of the Act.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Correspondence

Mr. Cran: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many letters were received from and sent to hon. Members by his Department in (a) January of the current year and (b) the present Session up to July.

Mr. Lawson: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 28 July 1989 at columns 1114-15.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of letters from hon. Members to his Department received a reply (a) in under four weeks, (b) within four to six weeks, (c) within six to eight weeks and (d) over eight weeks, in each of the last three years.

Mr. Lawson: I regret that the information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Central Office of Information

Mr. David Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is proposing any change to the Central Office of Information cash limit for 1989-90; and whether he is proposing any changes to the services provided on an allied basis by the Central Office of Information for 1989-90.

Mr. Ryder: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class XIX vote 1 will be increased by £92,000 from £1,181,000 to £1,273,000. The additional expenditure is needed to cover an increase of £92,000 in the cost of existing services provided by the Central Office of Information on an allied service basis to the royal household. The increase in the cash limit will be charged to the reserve and therefore, will not add to the planned total of public expenditure.

In addition, following the transfer of responsibility for the information officer management unit to the Cabinet Office, Office of the Minister for the Civil Service, the running costs limit for the Central Office of Information will be reduced by £186,000 from £22,036,000 to £21,850,000.

Civil Service Trade Unions

Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest estimates of the numbers of elected representatives of Civil Service trade unions in each of the main Government Departments and of the cost of providing paid time off.

Mr. Ryder: The details for 1988-89 are given in the tables which show that the total cost of facility time was £12·67 million. Compared with the position as at 31 March 1988, the total amount of paid time off for union business shows a reduction of 64 man years (6·1 per cent.), with a consequential saving of £0·41 million. This marks the seventh successive year in which facilities costs have been reduced.

National Accounts

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the figures for table 2-2, chapters 12-14 in the current years's edition of the United Kingdom National Accounts have not been updated for 1988; and if he will now publish the figures in the Official Report.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 23 October 1989]: Table 2-2: The analysis of gross domestic product by the manufacturing industries will, following the usual practice and reflecting the availability of data, be updated to cover 1988 in next year's edition.

Chapter 12: Estimates of tangible and intangible non-financial assets for the national and sector balance sheets will be updated when resources permit, and depending on the contribution they can make to assessments of economic developments. The personal sector balance sheet estimates for 1988 will appear, as usual, in the February 1990 edition of the CSO's "Financial Statistics".

Chapter 13: Estimates of fixed capital formation by certain industries in 1988 were not thought to be of an acceptable quality to permit publication. Such reliable estimates as can be made will appear in the quarterly national income and expenditure articles in the CSO's "Economic Trends.

Chapter 14: The estimates of capital consumption and capital stock are derived from the full range of fixed capital formation statistics. Some of the estimates for 1988 have not been produced because of quality problems with the fixed investment statistics.

Output

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the level of (a) world industrial output and (b) United Kingdom industrial output each year since 1960; what has been the percentage demand growth in each case; and what levels are predicted to be reached by the year 2000.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Levels of industrial production of the industrialised countries for each year since 1960 are published in the IMF publication "International Financial Statistics, 1989 Yearbook". A series of United Kingdom industrial production from 1948 to 1987 is published in "Economic Trends Annual Supplement, 1989", and the latest estimates for recent years are published in the latest Economic Trends. The OECD's latest forecasts of industrial production in its member countries are published in "OECD Economic Outlook", June 1989. The United Kingdom Government do not publish forecasts of industrial production. Forecasts of the growth of manufacturing output, the largest component of industrial production, are published in the FSBR and Autumn Statement.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Blue Arrow

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give an up-date of his Department's inquiry into the National Westminster bank and the Blue Arrow affair.

Mr. Redwood: The inspectors' inquiries into County NatWest are at an end. Their report was published on 20 July 1989 and copies were passed to the serious fraud office which is carrying out inquiries with the City of London police. Copies were also passed to regulatory authorities to enable them to take such action as they consider appropriate.

Post Office Counters Ltd.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to privatise Post Office Counters Ltd.

Mr. Forth: The great majority of post offices is already run by subpostmasters operating in the private sector and this number is increasing with the conversion of Crown post offices to agency or sub-office status. We have no further plans for privatisation of Post Office Counters.

Hotol Project

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department is taking to promote further European collaboration on the Hotol project.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: This is now a matter for the companies directly concerned. The Government remain ready to facilitate such contracts with other countries as the companies request.

Consumer Protection

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to introduce new legislation or regulations on consumer protection.

Mr. Forth: We intend to improve the protection given to consumers in a number of ways, including the introduction of regulations under the Consumer Protection Act 1987 on price indications and unit pricing about which we are currently engaging in public consultation, and changes to other legislation affecting consumers' interests.

Plain English

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps are being taken to promote plain English in the credit industry in expressing terms and conditions for loans.

Mr. Forth: The codes of practice of a number of consumer credit trade associations require the use of plain English in all communications with the consumer. In addition, regulations under the Consumer Credit Act which will come into force on 1 February 1990 require that certain consumer credit advertisements contain prescribed statements. These statements are in plain English.

Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of letters from hon. Members to his Department received a reply (a) in under four weeks, (b) within four to six weeks, (c) within six to eight weeks and (d) over eight weeks, in each of the last three years.

Mr. Ridley: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Design Services (Balance of Trade)

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the balance of trade in design services.

Mr. Redwood: Statistics relating to the balance of trade in design services are not available.

EC Discussions

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet his European Economic Community counterparts; and what matters will be discussed.

Mr. Redwood: I intend to maintain close contact with all my EC counterparts. I have recently met my German opposite number and some of his ministerial colleagues. The agenda for such meetings depends on issues current at the time.

Balance of Trade Statistics

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was (a) the trade surplus/deficit and (b) the ratio of imports to total trade in each of the EEC countries, Japan and the United States of America for the most recent date for which figures are available.

Mr. Redwood: The information is in the table:

Trade Balance and Ratio of Imports to Total Trade
12 months to March 1989

Country	Crude balance ECU billion	Import ratio per cent.
Greece[1]	−7·8	77
Portugal	−5·4	61
Spain	−13·9	58
United States of America	−99·4	57
United Kingdom	−44·4	57
France	−12·8	52
Italy	−10·4	52
Belgium/Luxembourg	−2·1	51
Netherlands	1·8	50
Denmark	0·8	49
Ireland	2·8	45
Germany	66·0	43
Japan	68·3	42

Arms Sales (South Africa)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, further to his reply of 18 October, Official Report, column 120, to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan, Her Majesty's Government are investigating the alleged arms deals between Ferranti ISC subsidiaries and shell companies in South Africa.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 23 October 1989]: Any evidence of alleged breaches of United Kingdom export controls is carefully investigated. It is not our practice to comment on individual cases.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Reciprocal Enforcement Agreements

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General what further steps are being taken to achieve reciprocal enforcement agreements in matters of family law and child custody.

The Attorney-General: The Government consider that the best way forward is to encourage countries to ratify the Hague convention on the civil aspects of international child abduction and the European convention on recognition and enforcement of decisions concerning custody of children and on restoration of custody of children rather than to promote a proliferation of different bilateral agreements. The Government take every opportunity to make their views known to those states that have still to accede to these conventions or to put them into effect. In relation to child maintenance orders, the United Kingdom is participating in the early stages of discussions aimed at producing an EC agreement.

Representation at Tribunals

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Attorney-General what action the Lord Chancellor proposes to take following the recommendations of the report "The Effectiveness of Representation at Tribunals," published in July.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor's Department is currently considering the report's contents in consultation with other Departments.

Reckless Driving

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Attorney-General for what reason the Crown prosecution service initially refused to support a reckless driving charge against Peter Sumner and Mark Hill-Trevor subsequently given custodial sentences by the Court of Appeal following a private prosecution.

The Attorney-General: The Crown prosecution service initially declined to prosecute Peter Sumner for the offence of causing death by reckless driving because it appeared that the evidence against Peter Sumner was insufficient to afford a realistic prospect of securing a conviction for that offence. In reaching that decision it applied the criteria set out in the code for Crown prosecutors. But the making of such assessments, particularly in this category of case, is not an exact science, as the conviction itself has shown. The Crown prosecution service assumed responsibility for a prosecution for the offence once the matter had been committed for trial by the magistrates court.

In the case of Mark Hill-Trevor there was no refusal to prosecute for the offence for which the defendant was convicted. The proceedings were at all stages conducted by the Crown prosecution service.

Dr. Kalim Siddiqui

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General if he will meet the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss possible legal action regarding the remarks made in Manchester on Saturday 21 October by Dr. Kalim Siddiqui calling for the murder of a United Kingdom citizen; if it is intended to issue any public statement about incitement to murder; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I have no plans to meet the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss Dr. Siddiqui's remarks, but may do so if the results of any police investigation are submitted to the Crown Prosecution Service. I will not make any public statement about incitement to murder; the constituents of the offence are clearly understood.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Attorney-General if he will prosecute Dr. Siddiqui for incitement to murder; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: A decision whether or not to prosecute Dr. Siddiqui for any criminal offences can only be made after an investigation into his activities has been conducted by the police. The Crown Prosecution Service has not been supplied with the results of any such investigation.

"One Girl's War"

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General what current legal action the Government are taking on the book "One Girl's War"; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Interim injunctions obtained in November 1986 against the distributor and two booksellers, restraining them from distributing or selling the book, remain in force.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

South Africa

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report the details of aid being provided to Mozambican refugees in South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: Out of a total commitment of £127,000, we have already spent so far this financial year £95,000 on Operation Hunger, a project which helps Mozambican refugees on the South African side of the border. This is in addition to more than £100,000 provided for emergency relief supplies since January 1988.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which South African organisations were consulted on Her Majesty's Government's policy for contributing to the Urban Foundation scheme for low-cost housing.

Mrs. Chalker: The Urban Foundation consulted widely among black community leaders. The British embassy in Pretoria took independent soundings from black community leaders inside South Africa; all encouraged us to contribute to the scheme.

ENERGY

Radioactive Waste Disposal

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the outcome of the International Atomic Energy Agency board of governors meeting on safety principles for radioactive waste disposal, held on 20 September; and if he will make available copies of the safety principles document.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The International Atomic Energy Agency board of governors approved for publication a draft report on safety principles and technical criteria for the underground disposal of high-level radioactive wastes during its September meeting. The International Atomic Energy Agency plans to publish the report in its "Safety Series" of documents before the end of the year. A copy of the published report will be placed in the Library in due course.

Oil Exploration (Wiltshire)

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on oil exploration in Wiltshire.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In the past three years two seismic survey programmes have been conducted in the county by petroleum licences, the results of which are being evaluated. No exploration wells have been drilled in the county since the well at Urchfont near Devizes was drilled in July 1986.

Gas Leakages

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what figures he has for 1987 and 1988 for gas leakages from the low-pressure distribution system; and what measures he takes to check the validity of figures provided by British Gas.

Mr. Peter Morrison: British Gas estimates that current leakage from the low-pressure distribution system is less than 1 per cent. of throughput. It is difficult to estimate such figures accurately and my Department is discussing with British Gas how the estimates may be improved.

WALES

Coastal Waters

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people took advantage of the Government's offer of a free meal and expenses if they would swim in Welsh coastal waters to see if they would become ill; and what results have been obtained to date.

Mr. Grist: No such offer has been made. If the hon. Gentleman is referring to the epidemiological study, announced by my hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, on 17 May, 264 people took part in the controlled cohort study at Langland Bay near Swansea on 2 September. Of these 134 were bathers and 130 non-bathers.

Farmers

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many farmers were employed in each county in Wales in (a) June 1988 and (b) June 1989.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information for June 1989 is not yet available. That for June 1988 is shown in the table:

Farmers, by county
June 1988

	Whole-time	Part-time	Total
Clwyd	3,148	1,309	4,457
Dyfed	8,839	3,301	12,140
Gwent	1,617	784	2,401
Gwynedd	3,563	1,517	5,080
Mid Glamorgan	717	374	1,091
Powys	4,911	1,490	6,401
South Glamorgan	418	165	583
West Glamorgan	621	393	1,014
Wales	23,834	9,333	33,167

Note:
These figures are for main holdings only, and include partners and directors where they too are engaged in farm work. Wives/husbands of farmers, partners and directors are excluded, even though the wives/husbands themselves may be partners or directors.

Radioactive Material (Curran Embankment)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will outline the actions taken by his Department, by the emergency services and by the local authorities following the discovery of a drum of radioactive material outside Unit 8, Curran embankment, on 19 October.

Mr. Grist: The national arrangements involving radioactivity (NAIR) were activated by the police who co-ordinated the activities of the organisations concerned. The Welsh Office advised the police of suitable teporary storage locations and made arrangements for the National Radiological Protection Board to collect and dispose of the source.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what actions he has taken, following the discovery of a drum of radioactive material dating from 1979 outside Unit 8, Curran embankment, to identify whether there are any other such deposits and to protect the public from any possible effects.

Mr. Grist: An Inspector from Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, acting on behalf of the Department, visited the site with the radiation protection adviser who had carried out monitoring and provided advice to the police as part of the NAIR arrangements. Further monitoring was undertaken which revealed no evidence of any remaining radioactive sources.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the seriousness and potential seriousness of the discovery of a drum of radioactive material outside Unit 8, Curran embankment, on 19 October; what level of radioactivity it contained; and how this relates to safety levels.

Mr. Grist: It appears that the source in its container may have been abandoned when the premises were vacated by a company which ceased trading in 1984. The container in question is of the type used for radiography sources. It is believed to hold a radioactive iridium-192 source, of activity 8 curies in 1980. Since this radionuclide has a half life of 74 days, only a negligible fraction of the original activity will have remained when the company ceased trading. No significant radiation exposure would have resulted from the discovery of the source after that period had elapsed, and I am advised by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution that on-site monitoring supports this conclusion. Nevertheless, I view any such abandonment of a radioactive source as being a potentially serious radiation incident which could cause public concern, and a highly irresponsible act.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he is satisfied with the operation of the emergency plan implemented following the discovery of a drum of radioactive material ouside Unit 8, Curran embankment, on 19 October.

Mr. Grist: Yes.

Farm Workers

Mr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many farm workers were employed in each county in Wales in (a) June 1988 and (b) June 1989.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information for June 1989 is not yet available. That for June 1988 is shown in the table:

Farm Workers, by County: June 1988

	Regular family workers	Regular hired workers	Total regular workers	Seasonal casual workers	Total workers
Clwyd	718	985	1,703	1,143	2,846
Dyfed	1,772	1,527	3,299	3,318	6,617
Gwent	414	459	873	660	1,533
Gwynedd	702	700	1,402	1,006	2,408
Mid Glamorgan	160	153	313	351	664
Powys	999	936	1,935	1,472	3,407
South Glamorgan	282	361	643	543	560
West Glamorgan					626
Wales	5,047	5,121	10,168	8,493	18,661

Notes:
1. Figures relate to main holdings only.
2. Regular workers include those working full-time and part-time.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to seek a meeting with the producers and researchers of the Thames Television "This Week" programme on toxic waste dumps, to ascertain the full list of locations of forgotten and hidden toxic waste tips in Wales.

Mr. Grist: No. The Department has already carried out a survey of contaminated land in Wales which lists abandoned toxic waste sites. Two reports of the survey which was carried out in 1982-83 and updated in 1987-88 have been made available to local authorities and other interested parties. I have placed a copy of the later report in the Library of the House.

Water Quality

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the water supplies (a) which will meet the European Community directive on tap water quality, 80/778/EEC by 1992, (b) which will not, stating the criteria each water supply fails to meet, the number of people affected and the planned date for compliance and (c) to what extent the position will have improved by 1995.

Mr. Grist: Copies of the undertakings accepted by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State under section 20(5)(b) of the Water Act 1989 and of the relaxations he has granted under regulation 4(1)(c) and 4(2) of the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those beaches which will comply with the European Community bathing water quality directive, 76/160/EEC, by 1992, and those which will not.

Mr. Grist: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the information placed in the Library by my hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning on 20 October.

Radioactive Incidents

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make it his policy to inform an hon. Member immediately when an incident involving radioactivity occurs in his constituency.

Mr. Grist: The police are responsible for implementing the national arrangements involving radioactivity (NAIR) and a decision whether or not to notify a Member of Parliament is for them.

Milford Haven

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total expenditure on Welsh Office funded projects in Milford Haven; and if he will list the projects.

Mr. Peter Walker [holding answer 23 October 1989]: The total estimated expenditure by the Welsh Office and public bodies funded by the Department on projects under way in Milford Haven in 1989-90 is £5,643,341.

The projects are shown in the table:

Project	Total estimated expenditure by WO £
Welsh Office
Milford Haven Enterprise Zone	4,668,440
Housing improvement grants	645,180
Repair and improvement of local authority housing	76,000
Pembrokeshire Community Drug Scheme	32,850
Regional Selective Assistance	25,000
Sports Council for Wales
Milford Haven Comprehensive School— Multipurpose Hall	40,000
Milford Haven Bowling Club	7,500
Wales Tourist Board
Millmoor Farm	40,000
Welsh Development Agency
Environmental Enhancement Schemes:—
Hamilton Terrace	57,163
Memorial Gardens	11,208
Town and Waterfront	40,000

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parking (Disabled People)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Lord President of the Council what are the current parking arrangements for staff of the House who are disabled and are orange badge scheme holders.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There are no places specifically set aside for orange badge scheme holders, but there are 12 parking spaces in Star Chamber Court and two parking spaces in the Norman Shaw car park reserved for the use of vehicles driven by or used by photo-identity pass holders who are disabled. At present eight hon. Members, four Members' secretaries and eight staff of the House have been authorised by the Serjeant at Arms to use these spaces on a first-come first-served basis. In addition, authority for their use is given from time to time to disabled visitors and to photo-identity pass holders suffering from a temporary period of incapacity. These arrangements were confirmed by the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee of the Services Committee in January 1988, as a result of a survey carried out into the use of the disabled spaces in Star Chamber Court.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Redundant Vicarages

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he intends discussing with the Commissioners the proposal that wherever possible redundant vicarages are sold on long leases.

Mr. Alison: I will discuss the matter with my fellow Commissioners. It is, however, for the incumbent and the diocese concerned to make an initial judgment as to the best method of disposal of a redundant parsonage house. The Commissioners, as a consenting party, then consider each proposal on its merits. Leasehold sales are not ruled out, but they may reduce the price or prejudice disposal and thus produce less for the support of the Church's ministry.

TRANSPORT

Bus Doors

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will summarise the response to his draft regulations which include provisions relating to the risk of people being trapped in power-operated bus doors; what action he now proposes to take, including provision of finance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: In my reply to the hon. Member on 27 July I said that I was consulting on whether the proposed new measures for centre doors should be applied to buses already in service. I now propose that they should so apply and will lay the appropriate order shortly. No special provision for funding will be made.

Radioactive Material

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list by year for the last 10 years how many tonnes of radioactive material were imported via the ports of (a) Barrow, (b) Dover, (c) Felixstowe, (d) Harwich, (e) Liverpool, (f) Portsmouth, (g) Southampton and (h) Workington; how many tonnes were exported through these ports; where were (i) the sources and (ii) the destinations of material imported and exported; and what method of transport was used to convey the material to and from the ports.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department does not collect this information, and it could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Don Valley on 4 May, Official Report, column 188, whether one of the columns, "UF 6 imported" should read, "exported"; if he will show the source and destination of material travelling through the Humber ports, and what is included in the column, "Natural exported", where this material originated and what was its destination.

Mr. McLoughlin: The middle four column headings of the answer are "Natural UF6 exports" and "imports" and "Enriched UF6 exports" and "imports". The additional detailed information requested on sources and destinations can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Railways (Noise)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations he had with the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds prior to his determination of future statutory limits on noise from railway trains; and if he will tabulate their limits in the Official Report stating whether they apply to machinery or to cumulative levels of noise over a given period of time and whether they are based on existing or projected line speeds.

Mr. Portillo: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) of 10 April 1989 at column 409. What the Government intend to establish is a standard for the purposes of noise insulation of properties affected by new railway lines, equivalent to that which already exists for new roads. The Government's conclusion will be published. There is no intention to establish an absolute statutory limit on noise from trains. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has not been consulted.

Road Signs

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding the standard of signs on motorways and other trunk roads.

Mr. Atkins: As well as those of the hon. Member, four representations about shortcomings in maintenance standards for signs on motorways and all-purpose trunk roads have been received in the last year. In addition, members of the public bring specific cases to the Department's attention from time to time.

Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of letters from hon. Members to his Department received a reply (a) in under four weeks, (b) within four to six weeks, (c) within six to eight weeks and (d) over eight weeks, in each of the last three years.

Mr. Atkins: This question could be answered only at disproportionate cost, but the requirement to answer correspondence from hon. Members as promptly as possible is a priority of the Department.

A47 Rutland

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will make a statement on progress since July 1985 in preparing proposals for a bypass on the A47 trunk road around Glaston, Rutland, Leicestershire; and when draft lines of route will be published.

Mr. Atkins: Earlier investigations suggested that a bypass of Glaston could not be justified. We are now reassessing the case for a bypass in the light of the revised national road traffic forecasts announced in May. It is too early to say whether a scheme can be added to the trunk road programme, or when details of any routes would be made known.

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will make a statement on the accident record in and around Glaston, Rutland, on the A47 trunk road; and what proposals he has for traffic management to reduce accidents, following the meeting in Glaston involving his officials on 5 October.

Mr. Atkins: The accident record for the A47 trunk road in and around Glaston is close to the national average for this type of road. The Department is now investigating road safety measures including those discussed at the meeting in Glaston on 5 October. Any worthwhile improvements will be carried out.

A2 (Road Works)

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report the number of weeks that the A2 between the Danson interchange and the Swanscombe cutting, has been under road works from 1 January 1984 to date.

Mr. Atkins: I shall write to my hon. Friend with the details as soon as possible.

King's Cross Railway Lands

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when, further to his reply to the hon. Member for Islington South and Finsbury of 20 October, Official Report, column 257, his Department expects to provide the comments referred to, to the London borough of Camden, in relation to the planning application for the King's Cross railway lands.

Mr. Portillo: The Department has been asked to submit its comments on the latest planning application by 14 November 1989.

Scottish Lowland Airports Policy

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to consider the evidence to be given at the Civil Aviation Authority public hearing on 14 and 15 December when making his decision on Scottish lowland airports policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. Friend's decision will be based on the responses received to the consultation document issued on 27 September, for which the closing date is Wednesday 29 November.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to seek the advice of the Civil Aviation Authority in determining whether there is sufficient evidence to justify licensing additional flights to the United States of America from Scotland, in his consultation exercise on Scottish lowland airports policy.

Mr. McLoughlin: Air transport route licensing is a matter for the Civil Aviation Authority. The authority's decisions are made in accordance with its statutory duties and are subject to any traffic distribution rules that may be in force.

Air Deregulation

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment his Department has made of the impact of air deregulation in Europe on Edinburgh and Glasgow airports; and if he will make a statement on air traffic movements expected at these airports following deregulation.

Mr. McLoughlin: The United Kingdom's liberal agreements with several countries mean that the benefits of liberalisation have already been achieved in several major markets.

In its consultation document on traffic distribution policy for the London area and strategic options for the long term (CAP 548), the Civil Aviation Authority noted this; it did not attempt to forecast demand against a range of liberalisation options but assumed that further liberalisation would give a mild stimulus to traffic. Growth in passenger demand will continue to be largely determined by the rate of economic growth. The Department's forecasts of United Kingdom air traffic demand in the period to 2005 are not disaggregated to airport level.

Road Improvements, Banbury

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department intends to give financial clearance for improvements to the Ruscote Avenue-Orchard Way junction in Banbury.

Mr. Atkins: Financial approval was given on 17 October 1989.

M40 Extension

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the progress of the construction of the M40 extension.

Mr. Atkins: Excellent progress is being made. Subject to reasonable weather conditions over the next two months I expect the Warwick section of M40 to open to traffic around the turn of the year. I hope that the whole of the M40 extension will be open to traffic by spring 1991.

A20, Dover

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to make an announcement on the route of the eastern section of the A20 extension into Dover; and when he expects the project to be completed.

Mr. Atkins: It is hoped to announce the decision on the route shortly. The aim remains to complete the project in time for opening of the Channel tunnel in 1993 subject to the satisfactory completion of the outstanding statutory procedure.

Road Safety Code of Good Practice

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received a copy of the road safety code of good practice published on 5 October by the local authority associations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: I congratulate the associations on having produced such an excellent publication. It is attractively presented, well written and contains much sound practical advice. I commend it to all local authorities. It represents a major contribution to the national effort to reduce road casualties by a third by the year 2000. Its recommendation that individual authorities should identify local targets for casualty reduction and develop road safety plans, to be reviewed and published on an annual basis, by which to achieve them is particularly welcome, as complementing our action in setting national and regional targets.

I shall be considering with local authorities at the regional annual consultative committees over the coming weeks the future arrangements for reconciling local and regional targets and for monitoring progress.

The enthusiastic and committed implementation by local authorities of the code's recommendations is essential if we are to achieve the dramatic reduction in casualties which we know to be possible.

HEALTH

Cochlear Implant Operations

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to make a statement regarding the funding of cochlear implant operations.

Mr. Mellor: As soon as possible.

Health Authorities (Capital Allocations)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the annual capital allocations to (a) North East Thames region and (b) Waltham Forest area in each of the past 10 years; and if he will show these figures adjusted with the National Health Service's deflator.

Mr. Freeman: Initial capital allocations over the past 10 years to North East Thames regional health authority are as follows:

	Allocations (at cash) £ million	Allocations revalued at 1989-90 prices £ million
1980-81	37·700	63·104
1981-82	45·800	69·852
1982-83	43·182	61·505
1983-84	45·452	61·873
1984-85	48·933	63·476
1985-86	48·617	59·778
1986-87	53·610	63·867
1987-88	54·143	61·290
1988-89	57·923	61·109
1989-90	73·076	73·076

Figures have been inflated to the current price level by use of the gross domestic product deflator and exclude in-year additions to the regional health authority's initial capital allocation through land sales and virement from revenue. The allocation of funds to districts is a matter for regional health authorities and this information is not held centrally.

Correspondence

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many letters were received from and sent to hon. Members by his Department in (a) January of the current year and (b) the present Session up to 1 July.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is as follows:

	Letters received	Replies issued
(a) January 1989	1,165	1,176
(b) Current Session up to and including 30 June 1989	14,337	10,615

RU 486

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the drug RU 486, produced by Roussel, is to be made freely available in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: RU 486, like other medicinal products, may not be marketed in the United Kingdom without a product licence. At the present time there is no such licence in respect of this product.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received concerning the drug RU486; and if he wuill make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: In the past 12 months we have received 10 representations about the drug RU486. Four were in favour of its introduction, three against and three sought information.

Child Abuse

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the indication of anal reflex and dilatation accompanied by additional symptoms is standard practice for diagnosing child abuse.

Mr. Mellor: The diagnosis of child sexual abuse is a matter for medical practitioners to reach based on the history of the case as well as any symptoms and physical signs that might be present. Recent guidance to doctors from the standing medical advisory committee makes it clear that no physical sign (of which reflex anal dilatation is an example) can at present be regarded as being uniquely diagnostic of child sexual abuse.

Kidney Transplants

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many kidney transplants there have been in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: According to information provided by the United Kingdom transplant service, the number of cadaveric kidney transplants performed within the National Health Service in the United Kingdom is as follows:

	Number
1984	1,443
1985	1,336
1986	1,493
1987	1,485
1988	1,575

Coronary Heart Disease

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest available estimates of the cost for (a) hospital in-patient care, (b) hospital out-patients care and (c) general practitioner consultations, resulting from coronary heart disease.

Mr. Freeman: It is estimated that the total cost of hospital in-patient treatment related to coronary heart disease in England is £175·5 million per year (1987-88 prices). I regret that information is not collected centrally on either the cost of out-patient care or on general practitioner consultations resulting from coronary heart disease.

Drug Trials

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are known to have died or suffered adverse reactions following their participation in drug trials.

Mr. Freeman: Adverse reactions, including deaths, are reported to the Medicines Control Agency. It is not possible to say how many of these are related to a particular drug being trialed.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will introduce legislation to impose controls and monitoring on the use of volunteers in pharmaceutical drug trials;

(2) if he will take steps to require companies which recruit human volunteers for drug trials to register with his Department; if he will institute controls on the use and payment of volunteers; and if he will take steps to monitor the effects on health of participation in drug trials;

(3) what information his Department has regarding the circumstances, financial position and health of those who voluntarily take part in pharmaceutical drug trials

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans to introduce monitoring or legislation in this area. Within the NHS all clinical research investigations involving human subjects, including healthy volunteer studies, must be approved by a local research ethics committee. Draft revised guidance on the role, scope and function of these committees is currently available for consultation and a copy is available in the Library. This guidance will be drawn to the attention of those outside the NHS sponsoring such studies.

Hearing Aids

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what action is being taken following the finding that the National Health Service is being overcharged for some hearing aids;

(2) what is the estimated cost to the National Health Service of the overcharging by some hearing aid manufacturers;

(3) when there was last an investigation of the charges made to the National Health Service by hearing aid manufacturers relative to those made to the private sector;

(4) which hearing aid manufacturers have been charging the National Health Service more for their aids than they charge private suppliers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman Responsibility for the procurement, storage and distribution of goods required for the NHS national hearing aid service passed from the Department to the Mersey regional health authority on 1 April 1985.

An in-house study was undertaken by the Mersey RHA during January and February 1989, during which the prices charged to the NHS by all the major suppliers of commercial hearing aids were reviewed. The results of the review suggest that considerable savings could be made if suppliers were to charge the same prices to the NHS as those charged to private dispensers.

All the main suppliers have now offered to supply commercial equipment to the NHS at reduced prices and the Mersey RHA is actively pursuing these matters with the companies concerned.

Drug Prices

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the National Health Service ever pays a higher price for pharmaceutical drugs than that charged by manufacturers to other customers; and what procedure there is for routinely comparing prices.

Mr. Mellor: The prices of branded medicines supplied to the National Health Service are controlled through the operation of the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme under which an overall limit is set on the profit which a company can make from such sales. Manufacturers' list prices apply to the home market generally; they do not distinguish between supply for use by NHS or private patients. There are no arrangements for individual price comparisons.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to replace or modify the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme due to come to an end in October 1992, in light of his plans for the National Health Service, outlined in the White Paper and accompanying documents.

Mr. Mellor: When the changes in "Working for Patients" have been implemented they will place a greater emphasis for prescribers on the price of drugs, and it may be sensible to modify the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme to reflect the fact. Paragraph 2.1 of the scheme, a copy of which is in the Library, provides the flexibility required to facilitate this.

National Health Service (Prices)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who negotiates prices charged to the National Health Service for supplies; and what monitoring there is to ensure reasonable charges and that the prices are not higher than those used in the private sector.

Mr. Freeman: Negotiation of prices charged for NHS supplies is a matter for individual health authorities acting under the strategic guidance of the NHS procurement directorate. The level of contracting depends on many strategic, technical and commercial factors that need to be considered by the directorate working closely with health authorities. The procurement directorate is charged by the NHS Management Executive to ensure that all health authorities operate an effective and efficient procurement service.

Handicapped Children

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many handicapped children are in long-term hospitals, local authority and voluntary sector care.

Mr. Freeman: Information is not available in the precise form requested. There are 14 children under 16 identified by regional health authorities in July 1989 as receiving longer-term care in large mental handicap hospitals. In addition there were, at 31 December 1986 (the latest year for which figures are available) 350 children resident in NHS community units for mentally handicapped children.

The number of children in care in accommodation for children with special educational needs at 31 March 1987 was 1,651. Many of these children will have physical and mental handicaps.

Infertility

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest statistics on infertility.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold this information centrally.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements his Department makes for the provision of IVF treatment for patients residing within the Wakefield constituency.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 24 October 1989]: We believe that decisions about the priority and resources to be given to infertility services should be left to individual health authorities rather than the Department of Health. This is the case with nearly all NHS services, since health authorities are in the best position to determine priorities in the light of local needs and circumstances.

Clinical Research Centre

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has for the future use of the clinical research centre in Harrow following closure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has asked the Advisory Board for the Research Councils for further advice by next spring on their proposals to reallocate support currently given to units at the clinical research centre to ensure a more effective use of scientific resources. This report will also cover the implications for NHS provision, and officials from this Department will be kept fully informed as the proposals develop.

Eye Tests

Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how frequently his Department will be monitoring the number of non-National Health Service sight tests; from what sources the statistics will be derived; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: A survey of sight test numbers will be commissioned later this year. On present plans, the survey will be conducted by an independent market research company and a representative sample of people will be asked if they have had an NHS or private sight test since 1 April 1989. The results will be compared with information for previous years already held by the Department.

Ambulance Service (Paramedics)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish a table showing for each ambulance authority the number of trained paramedics among its crews.

Mr. Freeman: Figures in the form requested are not available centrally.

"Working for Patients"

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what element of cost benefit analysis will be included in the indicative drug budgets proposed in "Working for Patients".

Mr. Mellor: The main purpose of indicative prescribing budgets is to encourage more cost-effective prescribing through more critical analysis of prescribed patterns. In consequence I expect cost benefit studies in this area to become more commonplace following the introduction of the scheme and that the results will be disseminated to general medical practitioners to help them to decide what is the most cost-effective form of treatment for each patient.

Post-operative Infections

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the latest figure per year for the number of hospital admissions that are due to post-operative infections.

Mr. Freeman: I regret that the information requested is not available. The latest available data on hospital infections are for 1985, when the total number of cases of post-operative infection was estimated at 15,540. However it is not possible to identify the proportion of those that resulted in readmissions, or the number of readmissions after surgery which were due solely to post operative infection.

Children's Cancer

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the figures for each of the health authorities in England and Wales, of children's cancer treatment postponements this year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold this information centrally.

Leeds Western Health Authority (Chairman)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Leeds, West of 14 September about the business activities of the chairman of Leeds western health authority.

Mr. Freeman: My hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health has now written to the hon. Member.

Erythropoietin

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects erythropoietin to be licensed for general use by the medical profession.

Mr. Mellor: For reasons of commercial confidentiality, it is not usual practice to disclose information about whether or not an application for a product licence has been received or the progress of any such application. However in this case I am able to say that a few technical queries remain and are being urgently pursued; if they are satisfactorily resolved a licence should then be issued shortly.

General Practitioners (Staff Recruitment)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will seek additional advice from general practitioners' representatives as to the practicality of practices recruiting qualified practice staff when subjected to a 10-week delay between submission of applications and receipt of NHS response, pursuant to draft No. 5 of NHS document Ref. 4237A/4311/m/4615/HT/1.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The detailed arrangements for handling applications for staff have yet to be finalised and are currently the subject of consultation with the GPs' representatives, the general medical services committee. But I can assure my hon. Friend that there will be no question of a 10-week delay in dealing with such applications.

Prescription Costs

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the prescription costs per patient for the 10 highest spending and the 10 lowest spending family practitioner committees in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 24 October 1989]: The average net ingredient cost per person in 1987-88 for the 10 family practitioner committees in England with the highest spending per person and the 10 family practioner committees in England with the lowest spending per person is listed in the table.

Notes:
1. OPCS family practitioner committees population data has been used in this table.
2. Data includes prescriptions dispensed by pharmacy and appliance contractors and dispensing doctors.
3. The Net Ingredient Cost (NIC) is the basic cost of drugs before any discounts and does not include pharmacy costs or fees.

Contaminated Food

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the implications for United Kingdom policy of the guideline levels drawn up for radioactivity-contaminated food in transfrontier trade, drawn up by the Codex alimentarius Commission under the auspices of the World Health Organisation and Food and Agriculture Organisations.

Mr. Maclean: I have been asked to reply.

In the event of a future nuclear accident, the United Kingdom would be bound by the maximum levels of radioactive contamination established by the European Community. These are set out in Regulation (Euratom) 3954/87, as amended by Regulation (Euratom) 2218/89, and Regulation (EEC) 219/89.

The levels established by the Community are entirely consistent with the advisory, de minimis levels recently promulgated by the Codex Alimentarius Commission, below which no food control restrictions need apply.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Working Parties)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers trained to teach the three to seven year age range are currently serving on working parties set up by the National Curriculum Council and the Schools Examination and Assessment Council.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information requested is not readily available. Twenty-nine primary teachers and other primary specialists are currently serving on working parties set up by the National Curriculum Council and the School Examinations and Assessment Council.

Soviet and East European Studies

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects the report of the working committee on Soviet and East European studies, delivered to him on 10 August, will be published; when he expects to give his view on it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The Universities Funding Council, the successor body to the University Grants Committee which commissioned the report on Soviet and East European studies, will be issuing the report to universities soon. The report contains recommendations which also relate to other Government Departments and organisations which I shall consult.

Community Charge

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will provide more funds to colleges and universities so that they can respond to a community charge registration officer in a way that allows them only to disclose information about students resident in a particular charging authority area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: No. The information needs of community charges registration officers are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Nutrition Departments

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many departments of nutrition there are within medical schools in the United Kingdom undertaking full teaching and research.

Mr. Jackson: Four, though the subject is taught and researched elsewhere in other university departments. The 27 medical schools follow the recommendations of the General Medical Council which provide for nutrition to be included in the undergraduate curriculum.

Nutrition

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of its budget the Medical Research Council is devoting to research specifically on nutrition in the prevention of cancer and cardio-vascular disease.

Mr. Jackson: I understand that in the financial year 1988-89, the Medical Research Council devoted about 0·9 per cent. of its overall budget (some £1,250,000) to research projects which were directly related to the study of nutrition as regards the aetiology and prevention of cancer and cardiovascular disease.

Many other projects supported by the council in the general area of nutrition research, on which the council's total expenditure is about £6 million annually, may in the longer term also prove to be relevant to the prevention of cancer and cardiovascular disease.

Research Councils

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what were the total budgets of the five research councils for the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Jackson: The details are as follows:

Research council budgets 1980-81 to 1989-90 — £ million

	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89	1989-90

Ambleside Infant School

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the head teacher of Ambleside infant school about inadequate school buildings; and what reply he has made.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend received a letter on 23 October 1989, from Dorothy Marshall, the head teacher at Ambleside infants school, Aspley, about, among other topics, inadequate buildings at her school. A response will be sent as soon as possible.

Children (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the percentage of children from each of the major ethnic minorities in (a) primary and (b) secondary education in England and Wales.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information requested is not available centrally, but my right hon. Friend has announced in circular 16/89 that statistics will be collected by local education authorities from September 1990 and that aggregate returns will be made to the Department in the summer of 1991.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ministers

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many nights each of the Ministers of the Northern Ireland Office spent in Northern Ireland during the months of May, June, July and August.

Mr. Cope: The information requested is as follows:

	May	June	July	August
Mr. King	5	9	6	—
Mr. Brooke	—	—	—	7
Mr. Stewart	11	5	8	—
Mr. Cope	—	—	2	6

Lord Skelmersdale	—	—	4	6
Mr. Needham	12	8	8	7
Mr. Viggers	10	9	9	—

Accident Statistics

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in each of the past three years for which figures are available, how many persons were (a) killed and (b) injured as a result of (i) road accidents, (ii) accidents in the home and (iii) terrorist attacks.

Mr. Cope: The three most recent years for which information is available is as follows:

	1986	1987	1988
Number of deaths by road accident	236	214	178
Number of injuries by road accident	9,206	9,722	10,789
Number of deaths by terrorist attacks	61	93	93
Number of injuries by terrorist attacks	1,450	1,130	1,047
	1985	1986	1987
Number of deaths by accidents in the home	172	163	138
Number of injuries by accidents in the home	4,183	4,389	4,236

Republic of Ireland (Discussions)

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what subjects he expects to discuss at his next meeting with representatives of the Government of the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: It is anticipated that the next conference will discuss a full range of subjects including cross-border security co-operation, the confidence of the community in the security forces and cross-border social and economic co-operation.

Kincora Boys' Home

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what compensation has been paid to those who were the victims of abuse during residence at the Kincora boys' home; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: A number of claims for compensation have been received by health and social services boards from former residents of Kincora boys' home. To date settlements in respect of five of these claims, amounting to £31,000 plus costs, have been agreed between the parties, and payment in each case has been made. The question of compensation is entirely a matter for settlement between the parties concerned.

UDR

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what decisions he has made in connection with the Ulster Defence Regiment arising from the meeting of the Anglo-Irish Ministerial Conference on Wednesday 5 October.

Mr. Brooke [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Questions relating to the Ulster Defence Regiment are primarily for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, but I refer the right hon. Gentleman to references to the Ulster Defence Regiment in the joint statement issued after the meeting of the Anglo-Irish Ministerial Conference on Wednesday 18 October, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Student Loans

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated cost of the introduction of student loans.

Mr. Jackson: I have been asked to reply.

An estimate was included in annex E of Cm. 520. An estimate of administrative costs, not calculated there, was provided in my right hon. Friend's statement on 19 June at columns 21-22. Work is continuing to refine those estimates; the results will be published in due course.

Allotments

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has any plans to bring the Northern Ireland Allotment Act 1932 into line with the legislation for other parts of the United Kingdom on allotments.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am aware of a recent request from the National Society of Allotment and Leisure Gardeners Ltd. for the Northern Ireland legislation to be brought into line with Great Britain. I understand this arose as a result of the concern expressed by one allotment holder about the possible loss of allotment sites in the Belfast city council area. The council has confirmed that it has no plans to dispose of any of its sites. There have been no other complaints about the legislation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Income Support

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many persons aged 16 and 17 years have (a) applied for and (b) been refused incomes support for each month on grounds of extreme hardship since 12 September 1988.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is in the table.

Applications for Income Support of grounds of "Severe Hardship"

Notes:
(1) Based on 100 per cent. count of applications received.
(2) Information relates to the number of applications received rather than to the number of individual young people involved. Some individuals may have applied more than once.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by region, how many persons aged 16 and 17 years have made applications for income support on the ground of extreme hardship; how many had been granted at 8 September and 6 October; and how many at the same dates had been granted income support on the ground of being within exempted categories, shown by category.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The number of applications for income support from 16 and 17-year-olds on grounds of "severe hardship", and the number of directions given to enable benefit to be paid at 8 September and 6 October, are in the table.

The number of 16 and 17-year-olds granted income support because they fall within one of the exempted categories ceased to be collected after October 1988 and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Appeal Tribunals

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the number of appeals heard by social security appeal tribunals and the number decided in the claimant's favour, the number decided in favour of the adjudication officer and the number adjourned in each quarter from the third quarter of 1988.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest national administrative statistics available on social security appeal tribunals relate to appeals heard in the first quarter of 1989. Information is provided in the table for the quarter ending September 1988, December 1988 and March 1989.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will show the number of appeals against disqualification from unemployment benefit for all reasons (a) heard and decided and (b) decided in claimants' favour, broken down for Great Britain, England, Wales and Scotland and by Department of Social Security region for the last four quarters.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest national administrative statistics available on social security appeal tribunals relate to appeals heard in the quarter ending 31 March 1989. Information about the number of appeals against disqualification from unemployment benefit is not readily available in the form requested. The figures supplied in the table are based on the total number of unemployment benefit appeals for the quarters ending 30 June 1988, 30 September 1988, 31 December 1988 and 31 March 1989.

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will specify the number of claims referred to adjudication officers by employment service staff because they neglected to avail themselves of or refused suitable employment; and how many were disqualified from receiving benefit on grounds of neglecting to avail themselves of or refusing suitable employment for the whole year 1988 and to June of the current year.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is available in "Unemployment Benefit Statistics—Annual and Quarterly Analyses of Decisions of Adjudication Officers", copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will specify the number of people referred to adjudication officers by employment service staff because of doubts about their availability for work; how many were disqualified from receiving benefit on the grounds of non-availability for the whole year of 1988 and to June of the current year; how many were so referred because of restrictions they placed on their availability; and how many were disqualified from receiving benefit on grounds of non-availability for work for the whole year 1988 and to June of the current year.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is not available in the precise form requested. Details of the number of decisions on claims to unemployment benefit given by adjudication officers relating to questions on availability are contained in "Unemployment Benefit Statistics—Annual and Quarterly Analyses of Decisions of Adjudication Officers", copies of which are held in the Library.

Earnings Rule (Abolition)

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners he anticipates will benefit by the abolition of the earnings rule; and what he estimates will be the annual average financial benefit to those pensioners.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: It is expected that approximately 400,000 pensioners will benefit from the abolition of the pension earnings rule from 1 October: those who deferred their entitlement and continued working, those whose entitlement was reduced by earnings over £75 per week and those who earned less than £75. In addition, all future pensioners will have the freedom to choose to continue working and claim their pension. It is not possible to estimate the average financial benefit as this will vary according to each individuals circumstances.

Disablement Benefit

Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the criteria by which the Government decided which occupations should be covered for disablement benefit purposes in relation to prescribed industrial disease ALO.

Mr. Scott: The Government have decided the occupations to be covered on the advice of the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council. Reflecting its concern about the implications for National Health Service audiological services, the council has considered it necessary to recommend that coverage be restricted to those considered to be most at risk of having suffered substantial hearing losses as a result of their work.

Benefits (Barnsley)

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total number of recipients in Barnsley metropolitan district for each year from 1979 to date of (a) supplementary benefit/income support, (b) supplementary pensions and (c) claimants required to be available for work.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 20 October 1989]: The metropolitan district of Barnsley is served by the local offices at Barnsley (East), Barnsley (West) and Wath-on-Dearne, but the boundaries are not conterminous. The information is as follows:

Benefits

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the value of (a) child benefit, and (b) invalidity benefit for a married couple as a proportion of average net earnings for all males and all manually employed males for each year between November 1978 and the latest date available.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 24 October 1989]: The information on child benefit is given in the table from April 1979 when the benefit was fully phased in. I regret that information is not available from which to calculate the average value of total invalidity benefit (including additional pension and invalidity allowance) received by married men. The table therefore relates only to basic invalidity pension with an increase for an adult dependant. It takes no account of additional pension or invalidity allowance.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Visas

72. Mr. Archer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to improve the present arrangements for processing applications for visitors' visas in the high commissions and embassies concerned.

Mr. Sainsbury: The vast majority of visit visa applications received by our posts overseas are processed within 24 hours. We are nevertheless constantly seeking to improve the processing of visit visa applications, particularly where this can be achieved without an increase in overall resources.

Punjab

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Indian Government on the refusal to issue visas to members of Amnesty International to investigate the human rights situation in the Punjab.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have in the past made it clear to the Indian authorities that we regard Amnesty International as a serious and responsible organisation. But the issuing of visas is a matter for the Indian Government.

Somalia

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact of renewed civil conflict in Mogadishu and other parts of Somalia during the summer on Her Majesty's Government's policies.

Mr. Waldegrave: We regret the deterioration of the situation in Somalia since mid-July which has led us to make further adjustments to our aid programme.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking, directly and in conjunction with other countries, to encourage an end to the internal conflict in Somalia.

Mr. Waldegrave: Together with our partners and allies, we continue to urge reconciliation in Somalia and to support efforts to bring about a peaceful solution.

Bulgaria (Ethnic Turks)

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to disassociate Her Majesty's Government from the conclusions in the Council of Europe document 6106 on the departure of some ethnic Turks from Bulgaria; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We agree with the authors of the document mentioned by my hon. Friend that the treatment of the ethnic Turkish minority in Bulgaria is cause for grave concern. We have long been critical of Bulgaria's poor human rights record, in particular the campaign of assimilation which has denied fundamental freedoms to the Turkish and other minorities in Bulgaria. We have repeatedly urged the Bulgarian Government to adopt more tolerant policies. I raised this with the Bulgarian ambassador in September.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take steps to meet his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts to consider the historical basis of the departure of some ethnic Turks from Bulgaria; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have, on many occasions, urged the Bulgarian authorities to cease their campaign of assimilation of the ethnic Turkish minority, which is the root cause of the mass departure from Bulgaria earlier this year. Many of our partners and allies share our views. We will discuss the issue with them from time to time, as long as the problem persists.

Human Rights (Commonwealth)

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on human rights violations in Commonwealth countries; and if he will list those Commonwealth countries in which elections have not been held in the past five years on the basis of universal adult suffrage with a secret ballot and opposition parties being allowed to participate.

Mr. Waldegrave: We receive representations about human rights in many countries, including some Commonwealth members. Where Commonwealth countries' practice on human rights give cause for concern, we make representations as necessary. Such representations are sometimes more productive if undertaken without publicity, and it would not always be helpful to disclose full details.

Details of the second part of the question are not readily available. I shall reply to my hon. Friend on this part in due course.

Trident

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those countries whose Governments have indicated to Her Majesty's Government since May 1979 that they consider the United Kingdom's purchase of the Trident nuclear weapons system from the United States of America is compatible with United Kingdom obligations under article VI of the 1968 nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: The purchase by the United Kingdom of Trident missiles from the United States is fully compatible with our obligations under the non-proliferation treaty. We have received no representations from any other Government on the subject.

Namibia

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's attitude to the composition of the United Nations resolution 435 package setting the conditions for the elections in Namibia as it affects the necessity for a two thirds majority decision on the type of constitution to be set up by the elected assembly.

Mr. Waldegrave: We see the principles concerning the constituent assembly and the constitution, which were agreed in 1982, as an essential part of the United Nations plan for Namibian independence. We are working to ensure that these principles are respected.

South Africa

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement defining Her Majesty's Government's position as to what will constitute a clear and irreversible change in South Africa.

Mr. Waldegrave: We believe the first step is for the South African Government to implement the concept developed by the Commonwealth eminent persons group, to open the way for serious negotiations to start about the future of South Africa.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the position of Her Majesty's Government on the five-year plan of the South African Government.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is not for us to comment on the plan. We have made clear to the South African Government repeatedly that we seek early progress on the creation of a non-racial South Africa with a government acceptable to all South Africans.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to call upon the South African Government to lift the restrictions which currently prohibit South African citizens and organisations from advocating sanctions.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will now call upon the Government of South Africa to cease all executions of opponents of apartheid to meet the preconditions proposed by the Organisation of African Unity to create a climate for negotiations in South Africa.

Mr. Waldegrave: We will continue to make representations in cases that are clearly political and where there are extenuating circumstances or grounds to doubt the fairness of the judicial process.

Thabo Mbeki

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he received a request to meet Thabo Mbeki, head of the international department of the African National Congress; and what reply he has sent.

Mr. Waldegrave: A representative of the ANC asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in Kuala Lumpur on 22 October if he would meet Mr. Mbeki. He indicated that he was prepared to do so if Mr. Mbeki was willing to agree to the suspension of violence on the basis set out in the negotiating concept of the Commonwealth eminent persons group.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what improvements have been made for the conveyance of passengers and freight between RMS St. Helena and the quayside at Jamestown, St. Helena.

Mr. Sainsbury: No quayside improvements have been made, but we are providing, through the aid programme, a harbour launch which will ease the transfer of passengers and baggage between the RMS St. Helena and the quayside at Jamestown, St. Helena.

Diplomatic Missions (Parking Fines)

Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish up-to-date figures recording the number of unpaid parking fines incurred by each diplomatic mission in the first six months of the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information requested by my hon. Friend is given in the table, which also includes those international organisations which have incurred unpaid fines. The figures may be reduced by late payment.

The total of 4,292 for the first six months of 1989 indicates a 26 per cent. reduction over the same period of 1988. It compares with nearly 67,000 in the first six months of 1984 before publication of the 1985 White Paper (Cmnd. 9497). We welcome this further reduction in unpaid parking fines and appreciate the co-operation of diplomatic missions since the introduction of the parking policy. We shall continue to monitor carefully the level of unpaid fines and bring pressure to bear on diplomatic missions to reduce this still further.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Quality Assessors

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appointments he intends to make to technical assessors for water quality within his Department.

Mr. Patten: The matter is still under consideration.

Sewage Bacteria (Drax Power Station)

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on sewage bacteria contamination from the Drax power station and its impact on surrounding areas and give details of any action to be taken by his Department.

Mr. Patten: Low river levels have caused abnormal amounts of silt to enter the cooling system at Drax and to be emitted from it. Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, in conjunction with other agencies, is investigating the position urgently. They will take whatever action may be needed to protect the public, if a health hazard is found to exist.

Oil Slick (Mersey)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many tons of chemicals were used to deal with the Shell oil slick in the Mersey in the summer;

(2) how many tons of crude oil escaped from the Shell oil terminal into the Mersey in the summer;

(3) how many tons of crude oil were recovered following the leakage into the Mersey in the summer.

Mr. Trippier: Aircraft from the Department of Transport's marine pollution control unit made two spraying sorties and sprayed a total of 6·4 tonnes of dispersant. In addition a vessel, commissioned and under the direction of the metropolitan borough of Wirral, sprayed a total of 12·6 tonnes of dispersant obtained from MPCU stockpiles.

It is estimated that up to 150 tonnes of oil escaped into the river. Once a leak was identified a vacuum tanker was deployed to act on oil at the leak site and more than 50 tonnes was recovered in this way and returned to the refinery. Much of the oil that landed on beaches was mixed with sand and removed. It is not possible to estimate how much of the oil was dealt with in this manner. Most of the oil lying on mud flats and salt marshes has, after consideration of expert advice, been left to weather naturally to avoid causing further damage through disturbance of these sensitive sites.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends setting up a public inquiry to investigate the oil spillage into the River Mersey on 19 August.

Mr. Trippier: No. The hon. Member will be aware of the ongoing investigations of the Department of Energy's pipelines inspectorate and the prosecution proceedings being undertaken by the National Rivers Authority. Our assessment is that these, when taken with the work of the independent expert advisory committee, which is to look at the longer-term environmental effects under the chairmanship of Professor Bradshaw of the university of Liverpool, should adequately cover the public interest in this matter.

Rents into Mortgages Scheme

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received in favour of introducing a rents into mortgages scheme in England similar to those announced for Scotland and Wales.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend and 12 members of the public have made such representations.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will conduct a survey into the potential popularity of a rents into mortgages scheme in England.

Mr. Chope: The Department commissions research from time to time into the factors which influence tenants' decisions on buying their homes, and will study the outcome of the experimental schemes in Scotland and Wales.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will visit the Coney Hill and Matson estates in Gloucester to discuss a rents into mortgages scheme with tenants.

Mr. Chope: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in which foreign countries a rents into mortgages scheme (a) is operating or (b) has operated.

Mr. Chope: I am not aware of any such schemes.

Council House Sales

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the value of right-to-buy discounts for sales in (a) Corby and (b) east Northamptonshire for each year since 1980-81.

Mr. Chope: Information on the discounts given on right-to-buy sales is not reported separately. The reported figures of total discounts on all sales are as follows:

Local Government Finance

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment why the advice contained within community charge practice note 23, paragraph 4.8, suggests that the names and addresses of all students should be disclosed to the community charges registration officer; what steps he is taking to safeguard the privacy of students not resident in the requesting CCRO's charging authority area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The guidance given in paragraph 4.8 of community charge practice note 23 reflects regulation 5 of the Personal Community Charge (Students) Regulations 1989 (S.I. 1989/443) which were laid before Parliament on 17 March 1989. Paragraph 4.8 of the practice note also outlines the steps to be taken by educational establishments to comply with the requirements of the Data Protection Act 1984. It is the responsibility of these establishments to ensure that they do so.

Long Leaseholds

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from, or on behalf of, house owners with long-term leaseholds regarding difficulties created by the freehold owners.

Mr. Chope: We have received a number of representations from hon. Members and a few from leaseholders themselves.

Rent Arrears

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the level of council house rent arrears for each district in England and Wales at April 1986 and 1989.

Mr. Chope: Local authorities in England report their rent arrears on their housing subsidy claim forms. I am arranging for details of the rent arrears at April 1986 to be placed in the Library of the House. A table was placed in the Library on 1 March this year showing rent arrears reported at April 1988 and those arrears as a percentage of rent roll. Corresponding information on the position at April 1989 is not yet available. For corresponding information about Welsh local authorities I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

PCBs

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will ask Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution to assess the potential dangers to the public of the polychlorinated biphenyls waste disposed of by the Purle Waste Company in quarries in south Wales; and if he will assess the danger to local housing from PCBs dumped at the Brofisken site.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is the responsibility of the district councils in Wales to ensure that waste disposal operations do not give rise to risk to public health. Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution is able to provide guidance or advice if required.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to instruct Her Majesty's pollution inspectorate to make a site evaluation of the Ty Llwyd quarry in the Sirhowy valley; to assess the danger to local public health from the polychlorinated biphenyl wastes tipped at the quarry.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is the responsibility of the local district council, the waste disposal authority, to ensure that waste disposal operations do not pose a threat to public health. Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution is able to provide guidance and advice if required.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to instruct Her Majesty's pollution inspectorate to assess the potential dangers from the dumping of polychlorinated biphenyls waste at Alvanley on Merseyside.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution is aware of the potential problems that may arise from the former landfill at Alvanley and is liaising closely with the relevant waste disposal and local authorities that have responsibility for the disposal of toxic wastes.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions sections 65 and 197 of the Town and Country Planing Act 1971 have been applied to clean up contaminated land; and how much money has been recovered from each polluting party in each case to pay for the clean-up.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Section 65 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 contains discretionary powers exercised by local authorities. There is no requirement to notify the Government when these powers are used and therefore this information is not readily available. Section 197 of the Act does not contain appropriate powers for dealing with contamination.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions sections 9 and 16 of the Control of Pollution Act have been applied to clean up contaminated land; and how much money has been recovered from the polluting party or parties in each case to pay for the clean-up.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No such information is available centrally, and it could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to evaluate the necessity to use section 115 of the Water Act 1989 to recover costs for the clean-up of contaminated land.

Mr. Howard: Section 115 of the Water Act enables the National Rivers Authority to carry out anti-pollution works, including to prevent polluting matter from entering watercourses where it considers this is likely to occur, and to recover the costs it has reasonably incurred from any person responsible. It would therefore be for the authority to consider, in any particular case, the extent to which the use of these powers might be appropriate in dealing with problems of water pollution associated with contaminated land.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions sections 92 to 100 of the Public Health Act 1936 have been applied to clean up contaminated land; and what financial resources have been recovered from the polluting party, or parties in each case to pay for the clean-up.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information about the use of sections 92 to 100 of the Public Health Act 1936 by local authorities is not held centrally. It could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Problems of contamination are dealt with by landowners and local authorities depending on the circumstances of each case; Government Departments are not normally consulted.

Environmental Assessments

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the effect of community charge capping upon the ability of local planning authorities fully to evaluate environmental assessment statements submitted in planning applications under the new European Community directive.

Mr. Chope: If any local authorities were selected for capping, the limits on the budgets proposed would take account of the individual circumstances of the authorities concerned.

Tap Water

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each water authority area the water supplies (a) which will meet the European Community directive on tap water quality, 80/778/EEC by 1992, (b) which will not, stating the criteria each water supply fails to meet, the number of people affected and the planned date for compliance and (c) to what extent the position will have improved by 1995.

Mr. Howard: I will place copies of the undertakings accepted by my right hon. Friend under Section 20 of the Water Act 1989 and relaxations granted under the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 in the Library.

Bathing Water

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those beaches which will comply with the European Community bathing water quality directive, 76/160/EEC, by 1992, and those which will not.

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the information I placed in the Library on 20 October at columns 261-62 about improvement programmes.

Water Standards

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish details of his agreements regarding the drinking water standards according to EC directives with the new water companies.

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the Answer given to the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on 26 October.

Methane

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what monitoring of methane in the atmosphere has been conducted since 1985; and what plans he has to extend this.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Mace Head monitoring station, which monitors atmospheric methane, as a part of the global atmosphere gases experiment is funded by the Department. The Harwell laboratory has made a study of methane emissions from landfill waste disposal sites. Both these activities are expected to continue, together with an important new study of advanced measuring techniques by the national physical laboratory.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Conway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the future of the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State announced on 25 May 1988 that the Property Services Agency should operate on business lines. Since then, good progress has been made and as a result the Government have decided that it will be in the long-term interest of the PSA and its staff to privatise its commercial activities as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made, which include the introduction of commercial accounts and the restructuring of its organisation. The earliest practicable date is likely to be in the second half of 1992.

The PSA's customers will be fully untied from 1 April 1990 and I will be giving the PSA some immediate freedom to compete for work in new markets so that it has an opportunity to establish itself in them in advance of privatisation.

The bulk of the PSA's activities relate to project management, design services, maintenance of property and estate management services and these will be the core of the new private organisation. Those of the PSA's current activities that are essentially governmental will be retained within the Department. These activities include management of the Government's common user estate, for which executive agency status will be considered.

Water plcs

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the capital structures proposed for the water plcs.

Mr. Howard: The Government have announced their intention to restructure the finances of the 10 water plcs, by writing off all their debt to the Exchequer and providing a substantial injection of cash. The restructuring will enable them, among other things, to fund major new capital investment in England and Wales.

In order to achieve this, I and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales intend to take the following steps. We propose by orders under section 86(1) of the Water Act 1989 to extinguish all the liabilities to the Exhequer of the 10 water plcs. Debts amounting to £5 billion will be written off on 15 November, as follows:

Water plc	£ million
Anglian Water plc	859
Northumbrian Water Group plc	450
North West Water Group plc	1,055
Severn Trent plc	831
Southern Water plc	276
South West Water plc	129
Thames Water plc	121
Wessex Water plc	315
Yorkshire Water plc	559
Total English plcs	4,595
Welsh Water plc	433
Total	5,028

Two of the companies, Anglian Water plc and Thames Water plc will be required to pay to the Government the sums of £61 million and £11·9 million respectively. In order to achieve this I propose to make directions under section 83(2) of the Water Act to Anglian Water plc and to Thames Water plc to issue debentures to the Treasury, also on 15 November, for these amounts. These debentures are expected to mature on 29 December.

We also propose to enter into agreements on 20 November, under section 87(1) of the Water Act, to subscribe for shares in each of the other eight water plcs, paying a total of £1·57 billion as follows.

Water Plc	£ million
Northumbrian Water Group Plc	122·6
North West Water Group Plc	329·7
Severn Trent Plc	361·0
Southern Water Plc	46·3
South West Water Plc	265·9
Wessex Water Plc	81·3
Yorkshire Water Plc	89·4
Total English Plcs	1,296·2
Welsh Water Plc	276·0
Total	1,572·2

These sums are expected to be paid on 29 December. The shares so subscribed will be included in the offers for sale of shares in the water plcs in November.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class X, vote 9 will be increased by £1,296,200,000 from £1,000 to £1,296,201,000. The increase will be charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure. A separate cash limit increase in respect of class XVII, vote 13 will be announced by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Wales.

The capital restructuring described above—the write-off of debt, issues of debentures and subscriptions of shares—is designed to give effect to the proposals announced by the Government on 2 August. The figures in those announcements related to estimates at that time of the cash in balance sheets at 31 March 1990 resulting from the restructuring of the 10 water plcs. These estimates have now been modified to reflect updated information. The price ceilings are as announced on 2 August.

Ministerial Cars (Catalytic Converters)

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to introduce cars fitted with catalytic converters into the ministerial car fleet.

Mr. Chope: Three cars fitted with catalytic converters have already been obtained for use by Ministers and a further one is on order. It is our intention to purchase only vehicles equipped with catalytic converters to meet the Government car service fleet replacement programme.

Road Salting

Sir Charles Morrison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether any research has been undertaken into the effects of winter salting of roads on the quality of river water and on the breeding capability of brown trout and other fish; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 17 October 1989]: I am not aware of any research which has been undertaken into the effects of the winter salting of roads on the quality of river water. However, I am advised that past research shows that limited amounts of salt in freshwater has negligible effects on the breeding capability of brown trout and other fish.

Sewers (Maintenance)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the likely range of total liability carried by the new water undertakings for repair or renewal of the sewers now in their ownership.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 17 October 1989]: My Department and the water service companies are in the process of finalising estimates of their future investment programmes including on sewerage and I will send details to the hon. Member as soon as I can.

Reservoirs

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will place in the Library any material submitted, requested or commissioned by him concerning any matters relating to Horton Bank top reservoir in Bradford, since 1979;

(2) what powers he has to ensure the safety of any reservoir; and what powers he has to direct or request a water authority or a water company to retain a reservoir, emptied on safety grounds, to be refilled and kept for recreational purposes;

(3) what representations he has received concerning the future of Horton Bank top reservoir in Bradford; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will list the statutory provisions that govern the sale by water companies of land owned by them close to reservoirs;

(5) if he will list the statutory provisions which relate to the imposition of right and obligation on public agencies to make inquiries into the safety of any reservoir owned by a water authority or water company.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 24 October 1989]: The Secretary of State appoints panels of independent civil engineers, under the Reservoirs Act 1975, to ensure the safety of all reservoirs with a capacity of more than 25,000 cu. m. County councils and metropolitan district councils are responsible for securing that owners comply with the requirements of the Act, which include having their reservoirs inspected and supervised by panel engineers and carrying out any safety measures they recommend. The Secretary of State requires reports from the local authorities every two years on any enforcement action they have had to take and he may, in the case of default, direct an authority to carry out any of its enforcement functions.

Under section 8 of the Water Act 1989, water undertakers have a general duty to take such steps as are reasonably practicable to make water or associated land available for recreation. And in considering proposals in relation to their functions they are subject to various environmental duties, including a duty to take into account any effect which the proposals would have on the beauty or amenity of a rural or urban area.

The Secretary of State is required by section 20 of the 1989 Act to enforce these general environmental and recreational duties. In taking enforcement action he could require a reservoir to be refilled once it had been made safe. But he would not take such action where the breach of duties was of a trivial nature, or where enforcement would be precluded by his general duties, for example, to secure that water and sewerage services are provided properly, to ensure that the interests of customers are protected, and to promote economy and efficiency on the part of the undertaker.

Under section 152 of the Act, water service companies are prevented from disposing of land transferred to them from water authorities unless they have the consent of the Secretary of State, or if that disposal is in accordance with a general authorisation given by the Secretary of State. The Act, the conditions of appointment and the general authorisation together ensure that no land is disposed of which is still required for water supply purposes. Special arrangements apply to the disposal of land which is in a national park, in an area of outstanding natural beauty or a site of special scientific interest.

As regards the Horton Bank top reservoir, the Secretary of State has received two letters asking for copies of the report on an inspection of the reservoir carried out earlier this year. The report was made to the Yorkshire water authority, the owner of the reservoir, and a copy was sent to Bradford metropolitan district council. It is for Yorkshire Water, as successor to the water authority, to decide on the future of the reservoir in the light of the report and of its duties under both the 1975 and 1989 Acts. The Department has no material relating to the reservoir.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what environmental protection measures deriving from European Community directives and regulations, apply to currently established enterprise zones; how environmental assessment measures apply to enterprise zones; and if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of implementation of environmental impact assessment in the United Kingdom.

Mr. David Hunt: European Community directive 85/337/EEC deals with environmental protection measures and directly affects enterprise zones. It has been fully implemented in Great Britain, in England and Wales through the Town and Country Planning (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1988. DOE circular 24/88 and Welsh Office circular 48/88 explain that provision should be included in planning schemes for enterprise zones designated since the directive, for the environmental assessment of projects within the scope of annexes I and II to the directive. I understand from my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland that similar arrangements are in force in Scotland. The indications from the first year of operation are that these implementation measures are fully effective, but my Department is commissioning research to monitor the position in Great Britain.

I understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, that, so far as Northern Ireland is concerned, the main regulations required by the European directive on environmental assessment have been made and others are in the process of being made. The regulations that have been made are fully implemented.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Submarines (Decommissioning)

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement about his Department's plans for the decommissioning of nuclear submarines.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to my answer on 24 October at column 646.

Clyde Lee Conrad

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has consulted his counterparts and the Justice Minister in the Federal Republic of Germany, to ascertain whether United States Army Sergeant Clyde Lee Conrad divulged to the Governments of Hungary and Czechoslovakia details of deployments of United Kingdom Lance missiles by the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not our policy to comment on such matters.

Greenpeace Book

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will obtain for his departmental library a copy of the Greenpeace book of the nuclear age, published in October.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence library has ordered a copy of this publication.

Middle East (Arms Sales)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to which countries in the middle east the United Kingdom has sold (a) short-range fighter aircraft, (b) aircraft with long-range bomber capacity and (c) chemicals capable of being used to produce chemical warfare agents, in each year since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: It has been the consistent policy of successive Administrations not to provide details of defence exports to specific countries.

Trident

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a statement on the awarding of the contract for the third Trident class submarine (SSBN 07); and what is the percentage break clause provision;

(2) if he will make a statement on the progress of the construction of HMS Vanguard and HMS Victorious;

(3) if his Department has any estimate of the additional costs to the Trident programme incurred by the strike at VSEL in 1988, which will be borne by his Department;

(4) in which years it is now expected that each of the four Trident class submarines will become operational;

(5) what are the currently projected programme acceptance and contract acceptance dates for the fourth Trident class submarine (SSBN 08), and the projected percentage break clause provision for this contract.

Mr. Neubert: Construction of SSBNs 05 (Vanguard) and 06 (Victorious) continues to progress well. We remain on course to achieve the initial deployment of Trident in the mid-1990s.

The additional cost to the Trident programme of last year's strike at VSEL is not expected to exceed £10 million. Revised terms are being sought for future contracts, under which such additional costs will be no longer fall to the Ministry of Defence.

We intend to place the order for SSBN 07 by the end of this year. The tender for SSBN 08 will be invited in due course following the SSBN 07 order. I anticipate that the contracts for both SSBN 07 and 08 will include standard break clauses which provide for reimbursement to the contractor of properly incurred costs up to 100 per cent. of the contract value.

For reasons of security, I am not able to comment on specific acceptance dates or to give the planned in-service dates for individual submarines.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if there has been any cost escalation in the Trident programme, subsequent to the submarine-launched development testing of the Trident D5 missile;

(2) if there have been any changes to the expected first delivery or in-service dates of the Trident programme, due to the submarine-launched development testing of the Trident D5 missile;

(3) if there have been any major changes in specification, in terms of launch ability, accuracy, range and so on, to the envisaged capability of the Trident programme, subsequent to the submarine-launched development testing of the Trident D5 missile.

Mr. Alan Clark: The submarine-launched development testing of the Trident D5 missile has not resulted in any changes to the timetable for the missile's planned introduction into service with the Royal Navy, nor has it resulted in any major changes to the missiles's specification. The United Kingdom pays a fixed development charge for Trident and is not liable for the development costs of rectifying the cause of the recent missile failures.

Experimental ELF Transmitter

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department is still considering alternative sites to the Glengarry Forest site for the placement of an experimental ELF transmitter.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Maple Flag Exercises

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many and what types of Royal Air Force aircraft participated in Exercise Maple Flag 21; over what period the exercise was held; and how many work-up training sorties for this exercise were conducted over the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Information on Exercise Maple Flag was provided to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) on 10 May 1989 at column 472. Only the minimum essential amount of work-up training was conducted in the United Kingdom in preparation for these exercises.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on planned Royal Air Force participation in Maple Flag exercises in the coming year.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is planned that nine Royal Air Force Jaguar aircraft will participate in Exercise Maple Flag at Canadian Forces base Cold Lake, Alberta in 1990.

Nuclear Weapons (Verification Research)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if her Majesty's Government will take steps actively to co-operate in verification research relating to nuclear weapons at sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom is not involved in negotiations relating to nuclear weapons at sea. However, we follow developments in this field of verification research closely, and consult our allies on such matters as and when appropriate.

Public House, Knightsbridge (Assault)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action has been taken in respect of the assault on 6 September on a black soldier by two members of the Household Cavalry at a public house in Knightsbridge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The incident is being investigated by the special investigation branch of the Royal Military Police. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to the hon. Member once our investigation is complete.

Departmental Stocks and Supplies

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current level of his Department's stocks and supplies stolen or vandalised; what progress has been made to introduce bar coding and other improved security measures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information is not available in the form requested. In the case of crimes reported to the Ministry of Defence police, statistics are published in annex E to the annual report to the chief constable, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. However, similar information is not available in respect of those crimes reported to and investigated by Home Department police forces or the Services police.

Bar coding is being gradually introduced into the Ministry of Defence as a means of obtaining data but is not a security measure in itself. The Department is mindful of the need for adequate security measures and these are regularly appraised and updated as necessary. It is not, however, our policy to publicise these measures.

Advanced Avionics Architecture and Packaging Development

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the purpose and estimated cost of the advanced avionics architecture and packaging development.

Mr. Alan Clark: The advanced avionics architecture and packaging programme will consider the potential for modular avionics architecture in order to enhance operational capability and to reduce costs of ownership. Some minor studies are being undertaken but it is too early to give an estimate for any follow on work.

Anthorn Military Establishment

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the purpose of the military establishment at Anthorn.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There is a NATO naval communications installation at Anthorn.

Aircraft Tail Fins

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why the tail fins of Royal Air Force aircraft are in bright colours; what proportion of front-line fast jet squadrons have these colours applied; which other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation air force has adopted this policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Many RAF squadrons paint the tail fins (and other parts) of their aircraft with the insignia of their squadron or their squadron numbers. This helps to create an esprit de corps, and facilitates identification in peacetime. Although the RAF does not have a formal policy to identify aircraft in this way, all markings used have official approval. No record is kept of the number of front-line fast jet aircraft or squadrons with such insignia.

The policy of other NATO Governments and air forces on such markings is a matter for them, but I understand that it is normal practice for squadrons to identify aircraft with their own insignia.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Farmers

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimates he has of the number of working farmers in England who derive more than half of their income from occupations outside agriculture or forestry; and what estimates he has of the recent trend in these figures.

Mr. Curry: No estimates are available.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimates he has of the proportion of the total number of working farmers in England who are aged (a) over 60 years, (b) over 50 years and (c) under 40 years; and what estimates he has of the proportions for (a), (b) and (c) for: (i) the south-west region, and (ii) Somerset.

Mr. Curry: The nearest available information is as follows. It is taken from the results of a sample inquiry conducted for the EC farm structure survey 1985. The percentages are based on the number of holdings farmed by persons, excluding those farmed by firms and institutions. Information is not available at county level.

Percentage distribution of farmers by age group: 1983

Under 35 years	6·9	6·6
35 to 44 years	20·5	20·7
45 to 54 years	26·5	26·6

Butter Fat

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research is being undertaken, or is proposed to be undertaken by his Department into alternative uses for excess butter fat.

Mr. Curry: My Department does not undertake any such research and has no plans to do so. However, European Community funds for market research into dairy products are available to industry from the milk co-responsibility levy receipts and, in 1988-89, some £849,000 was allocated for this purpose. Of this, about £186,000 was earmarked for research projects concerned with the use of cream in products other than butter and another £186,000 for market research into certain cheeses.

Alar

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his Department's current policy towards use of the apple spray Alar following the decision by Uniroyal to withdraw it from sale for food use, after the disclosure in tests of (a) lung tumours in mice and (b) liver tumours in rats.

Mr. Gummer: The current approvals for Alar have been under review since February this year. The independent Advisory Committee on Pesticides in April considered all available data on daminozide, the active ingredient of Alar, and its breakdown product UDMH. It concluded these did not show a health risk, but asked the manufacturers to provide as quickly as possible the results of further tests being carried out on UDMH. A summary of the interim results arrived in September and was reported to the ACP; the supporting data have just become available and are being studied urgently. The doses of UDMH given to both rats and mice were massive compared to any amounts likely to be encountered by humans. Animals dosed with significant amounts showed no more tumours than the control group but very large doses produced some effects and the ACP is now considering whether or not these indicate any change in its assessment of risk. Its recommendation to Ministers will be made public.

These tests were reported in September to a group of international experts on pesticide residues working jointly to the Food and Agriculture Organisation and World Health Organisation. It recommended that an acceptable daily intake of 0·5mg/kg body weight/day could safely be set for daminozide.

The decision of the manufacturers to withdraw Alar was taken on commercial grounds since they have stated publicly that they do not believe its use on food crop poses a significant risk to public health. However, they have also stated that even if continued registration of their product is successful they believe that growers and the food industry would be reluctant to return to their product.

Mr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recommendations were made at its last meeting by his advisory committee on pesticides with regard to the use of Alar.

Mr. Gummer: The advisory committee did not make any recommendations at its last meeting on the use of the product Alar.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will re-examine the procedures whereby the apple spray Alar was given clearance by the Advisory Committee on Pesticides in the light of the withdrawal of the product by its makers Uniroyal.

Mr. Gummer: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave today to the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond). I see no reason to re-examine the procedure of the ACP.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what stocks of the apple spray Alar exist in this country; whether users will be permitted to exhaust these; and what plans he has to order their withdrawal.

Mr. Gummer: I have no quantitative information about stocks of Alar in this country.

I have no plans to order withdrawal of Alar stocks from growers. Continued usage of their stocks will depend on the advice of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides during its review of daminozide.

Salmonella

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his replies of 17 May, Official Report, columns 212-13, and of 19 June, Official Report, column 44, whether those provisions awaiting implementation on 19 June have now been implemented.

Mr. Gummer: Yes. New orders come into force today which extend compulsory testing for salmonella to include hatcheries and include registration requirements which will apply from 2 April 1990, for breeding and laying flocks and hatcheries. Codes of practice on the production of final feed for livestock and animal protein were introduced on 7 August. The adoption of these measures reflects the Government's determination to tackle the salmonella problem at each point along the chain from poultry feeding stuffs, through the breeding flocks and hatcheries to the laying houses and then on to the home.

Farm Workers

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many farmers were employed in each county in England in (a) June 1988 and (b) June 1989;

(2) how many farm workers were employed in each county in England in (a) June 1988 and (b) June 1989.

Mr. Gummer: The figures for 1988 have recently become available and are shown in the tables. The processing of the June 1989 census is continuing and will be published as soon as possible.

Deer (Tuberculosis)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all the measures he (a) has taken or (b) plans to take to control the spread of tuberculosis from farmed deer, indicating whether the Government or the farmers bear the cost of each measure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Legislation making tuberculosis in deer a notifiable disease and giving power to require the testing of deer (which will be used in known infected herds) came into force on 1 June 1989. Marking and movement record requirements came into force on 1 September 1989. The cost of administering these schemes falls to the Government, but the cost of testing, marking and keeping of movement records falls to individual farmers. A compulsory slaughter with compensation scheme was introduced also on 1 September 1989 with the Ministry paying compensation at 50 per cent. of the value of the slaughtered animal subject to a ceiling of £600 per animal.

Several meetings of the deer health scheme advisory group have been held and agreement has been reached to introduce a deer health scheme within the next few weeks. Details of charges under the scheme are still being discussed.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the research projects he is carrying out or funding to look into the level of tuberculosis in wild and farmed deer and methods of controlling the spread of the disease; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Research on the development of diagnostic tests for detecting tuberculosis in deer is currently being carried out at my Department's central veterinary laboratory. This forms part of a wider programme, designed to safeguard human health by reducing the incidence of tuberculosis in cattle and wildlife through improved diagnostic tests and the development of a vaccine for badgers.

My Department has recently invited proposals to begin in 1990-91 under the open contracting fund on the following topics:

the ecology of deer as it relates to domestic animal husbandry and the possible spread of tuberculosis and pathogenic mycobacteria; further work on improving the sensitivity and specificity of diagnostic tests for deer.

Food Safety Directorate

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about his plans to set up a food safety directorate, including the date for its introduction and the powers it will have.

Mr. Gummer: I shall make a further announcement shortly.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 22 June, Official Report, column 249, if he will publish the results of his first quarterly survey into the incidence of bovine spongiform encephalopathy at EEC approved and non-EEC approved slaughterhouses.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 3 July 1989]: In the period April to June 1989, 17 suspected cases of BSE were reported at EC approved slaughterhouses, of which 16 were confirmed, and nine at non-EC approved slaughterhouses of which five were confirmed.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many confirmed cases of BSE have been reported to him to date in cattle first identified as infected by BSE by veterinary inspection at (a) fatstock markets and (b) slaughterhouses.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Since BSE became notifiable on 21 June 1988 up to 30 June 1989, a total of 58 suspect cases of BSE were identified at markets, of which 39 were confirmed, and 85 cases were identified at slaughterhouses, of which 62 were confirmed.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of confirmed cases of BSE for each county of England and Wales for the four-week periods ended (a) 16 July, (b) 16 August, (c) 16 September and (d) 16 October.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The information is as follows:

SCOTLAND

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many meetings he has held with (a) the Scottish Business Group and (b) the Scottish TUC in the past 12 months.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has attended four meetings of the Scottish Business Group since October 1988. He is due to meet the general council of the Scottish Trades Union Congress on 10 November.

Hospital Redundancies

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each hospital board the total number of redundancies following the award of private contracts to the nearest available date.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of staff of health boards who have become redundant as a result of contracts awarded to private contractors in the period to 1 October 1989 is shown in the table. There have been no redundancies for this reason in other health boards. The vast majority of those made redundant were offered posts by the successful private contractors and a substantial proportion of those took up the offer of employment.

Health Board	Number of staff made redundant
Argyll and Clyde	98
Ayrshire and Arran	35
Fife	20
Grampian	243
Greater Glasgow	1,840
Lothian	666
Tayside	236

Housing

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing (a) for all Scotland and (b) for each district council a breakdown per 1,000 of the population of public spending on housing from 1977-78 to 1988-89 at constant prices.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested at (a) is set out in the table.

Public spending on housing per 1,000 of the Scottish population (at 1988-89 constant prices)

The data required to provide the information requested at (b) are not available centrally.

Interest Rates

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received from the Scottish Business Group about the effect of high interest rates on the Scottish economy.

Mr. Lang: Subjects discussed at meetings of the Scottish Business Group are normally confidential and it would not be appropriate for me to divulge them.

Historic Buildings

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps the Government propose to take to preserve the textile mills of Scotland, which are listed buildings regarded as being architecturally important, from dereliction and neglect.

Mr. Rifkind: Listed status affords a building statutory protection. The maintenance of a listed building, as of any other building, is the responsibility of its owner. Listed building consent procedures ensure that any changes to a listed building will, as far as possible, preserve its character.

I give historic building grants for buildings which are of outstanding architectural or historic interest. Since 1985, repairs to former textile mills at Forfar, Dundee and New Lanark have been grant assisted.

Council Housing (Rent Arrears)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the level of council house rent arrears for each Scottish district and islands authority at (a) April 1986 and (b) April 1989.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on the accumulated rent arrears owed to Scottish local authorities is collected annually on the basis of arrears outstanding at 30 September. The amounts outstanding at 30 September 1985 and 30 September 1988 are as follows:

Rent arrears of District and Islands Councils at 30 September

Nursery Education

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is able to assess the current annual revenue cost of providing nursery education.

Mr. Lang: In 1987-88, the latest year for which figures are available, 39,290 children attended local authority nursery schools at a revenue cost of £30·7 million.

Lead Water Pipes

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he is able to estimate the number of public sector properties in Scotland which require replacement of domestic lead piping; and if he is able to estimate the position affecting private sector properties;

(2) if he is able to estimate the total cost of eliminating lead piping from all of Scotland's domestic and private water supplies;

(3) what is his estimate of the total numbers of persons currently served by lead water piping in domestic property.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information on which to base such estimates is not held centrally.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is able to estimate the total cost of eliminating lead piping from all of Scotland's water supplies to property.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The number of properties that still have lead pipes connecting them to public water supply mains is not know accurately. However, the cost of replacing such pipes has been broadly estimated at £300 million. There are no lead water mains in public water supply systems.

Information on private supplies is not held centrally.

Farming

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will detail the measures being taken by his Department to encourage diversification into organic farming.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We have already set the framework for organic production by establishing under the auspices of Food From Britain the United Kingdom register of organic food standards which sets standards for the production and processing of organic produce and serves as a quality assurance mark for consumers.

The set-aside scheme offers farmers an opportunity to switch to organic methods: land may be put to fallow either for the full five year set-aside period or in rotation with cropping, thus allowing land to be taken out of intensive production and cleared of chemical residues. We are also considering whether the European Community arable extensification scheme, which is due to be implemented shortly, might include provision to assist a switch to organic production methods.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will identify the sums of money paid by his Department to organic farmers in Scotland in the past five years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The assistance from the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland to the farming industry is generally available to both organic and other farmers on the same basis and it is not possible to identify separately the sums paid to organic farmers. Assistance aimed specifically at promoting the development of organic farming includes the funding of research and development work carried out by the Scottish agricultural colleges. The recently-launched joint pilot project to be carried out by the Edinburgh university centre for human ecology and the Edinburgh school of agriculture to demonstrate the viability of organic farming has also attracted public funding from the Scottish Development Agency as well as support from the European Community and Safeway plc. Part of the Scottish Development Agency contribution will assist the Scottish Organic Producers' Association with market development work and will help to meet the cost of providing training and marketing advice to organic producers.

Mr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many farmers were employed in each county in Scotland in June 1989.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Scottish counties ceased to be used for agricultural statistics purposes after 1975 following local government reform. When regional results for June 1989 become available my noble Friend the Minister of State will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many farm workers were employed in each county in Scotland in June 1989.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Scottish counties ceased to be used for agricultural statistics purposes after 1975 following local government reform. When regional results for June 1989 become available my noble Friend the Minister of State will write to the hon. Member.

Schools Inspectors

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many of Her Majesty's inspectors' reports were prepared for (a) education authority schools and (b) independent schools in each of the years 1979-80 to 1988-89, inclusive.

Mr. Lang: Publication of Her Majesty's inspectors' reports on schools was instituted from the beginning of the 1983-84 session. The number of reports produced for education authority schools and independent schools in each of the years since then are:

	Education authority	Independent
1983-84	143	3
1984-85	152	5
1985-86	158	2
1986-87	158	4
1987-88	146	3
1988-89	121	3

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was (a) the total expenditure on research undertaken by Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools in each of the years 1985-86, 1986-87, 1987-88 and 1988-89 inclusive, (b) the number of staff involved in research undertaken by the inspectorate in each of those years, and (c) the number of reports prepared by the inspectorate in each of those years.

Mr. Lang: Her Majesty's inspectors of schools do not undertake educational research projects.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many targeted inspections were undertaken by Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools in 1988-89.

Mr. Lang: All inspections conducted by Her Majesty's inspectorate are targeted to meet agreed objectives, which are notified to the establishments concerned at the outset of inspection.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to review the role of Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools.

Mr. Lang: No.

Technology Academies

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many (a) pupils (b) teachers and (c) non-teaching staff are being considered for the first technology academy;

(2) if he will give the total estimated expenditure for technology academies in each of the years 1989-90 and 1990-91 for capital and current expenditure;

(3) if he will give the total estimated expenditure likely to be contributed from the private sector for setting up the first technology academy including (a) the amount of capital expenditure for the construction or refurbishment costs and (b) the organising revenue costs;

(4) when he will announce the location of the first technology academy in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: No decisions have been made by the Glasgow Technology Academy Company regarding the location or size of the first academy. It is therefore too early to give an indication of pupil and staff numbers or estimated expenditure. Trusthouse Forte have already announced its decision to contribute £1·5 million towards the cost of establishing a technology academy.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he has consulted (a) Glasgow district council, (b) Eastwood district council, (c) Strathclyde regional council and (d) Greater Glasgow health board about a site for a technology academy in Glasgow;

(2) if he will list the education authorities which have expressed an interest in hosting the first technology academy;

(3) if he will list the sites in Glasgow which have been consulted by his Department for the first technology academy.

Mr. Lang: The identification of a site for a technology academy and any relevant consultation are matters for the Glasgow Technology Academy Company. Earlier this year my right hon. and learned Friend held discussions with Strathclyde regional council about the possibility of its participating in the establishment of an academy in Glasgow. Unfortunately the regional council was unable to pursue this proposal.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many technology academies he will establish in Scotland in the period 1989-90 to 1991-92.

Mr. Lang: A firm and generous offer of sponsorship has been made for the first technology academy. Progress with others will depend on the availability of further sponsorship.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if any meetings have taken place with the teaching unions and professional associations about technology academies;

(2) if he will list the organisations which have been consulted about technology academies.

Mr. Lang: A policy paper about the establishment of technology academies in Scotland was issued on 12 October 1988. A copy of this paper and a list of recipients has been placed in the Library.

Schools (Advertising)

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to (a) use public expenditure for publicity and advertising for self-governing schools and (b) set up a similar body to the Grant-Maintained Schools Trust to promote opting out.

Mr. Lang: In line with normal practice I intend to make available to school boards and others information and advice on the operation of new legislation giving Scottish parents the right to seek self-governing status for a school. Setting up a body on similar lines to the Grant-Maintained Schools Trust would not be a matter for Government.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for school boards (a) the total expenditure on publicity and advertising and (b) the total estimated expenditure in each of the years 1987-88 and 1988-89.

Mr. Lang: The figures for expenditure on information about School Boards are as follows:

Total expenditure to date—£790,000
Expenditure in financial year 1988-89—£48,000

No expenditure on information about school boards was incurred in financial year 1987-88.

Employment Training

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give in each of the months September 1988 to September 1989 (a) the total number of applications from single parents on employment training for financial assistance with child care, (b) the numbers approved and (c) the total expenditure.

Mr. Lang: This information is not collected by the Training Agency and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was (a) the total number of occupied places on employment training for the most recent date for which information is available, (b) the total number of planned places in employment training in 1989-90, (c) the total planned expenditure on employment training in 1989-90 and (d) the total expenditure on employment training for the most recent dates for which information is available.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is as follows:

(a) The number of Employment Training filled places in Scotland as at 20 October 1989 was 25,446.

(b) The number of Employment Training planned places in Scotland for the year to March 1990 is 36,002.

(c) The total planned expenditure on Employment Training in Great Britain in 1989-90 is £1,271 million. No separate detailed figure is provided for Scotland. However, the Scottish share is estimated at approximately £153 million.

(d) The total expenditure on Employment Training in Great Britain for the period 1 April 1989 to 31 August 1989 was £388 million. No detailed figure is available for Scotland. However, the Scottish share is estimated to be approximately £47 million.

Independent Schools

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the steps and procedures involved in monitoring and reviewing (a) the development of the curriculum, (b) teacher training and (c) quality and standards of educational attainment within independent schools.

Mr. Lang: Independent schools are, like other schools, subject to inspection on a continuing basis by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools to ensure that efficient and suitable instruction is being provided. Such inspections will take account of the state of the curriculum, the quality of teaching and the level of educational attainment.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish Her Majesty's inspectors' reports for independent schools.

Mr. Lang: Reports on independent schools are published in the same way as for education authority schools.

Economic Output

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was (a) the index of output for production industries divisions 1-4 and (b) the output per person employed for each of the years 1979 to 1989, inclusive, using the employed labour force as a denominator.

Mr. Lang: Estimates of the employed labour force are not available for the production industries in Scotland. The table shows an index of output in the production industries (SIC divisions 1 to 4) for Scotland together with estimates of employees in employment. Output per employee is calculated and expressed in index form for comparative purposes.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was (a) the total index of output of manufacturing industrial divisions 2-4 and (b) the output per person employed for each of the years 1979 to 1989, inclusive, using the employed labour force as a denominator.

Mr. Lang: Estimates of the employed labour force are not available for the manufacturing industries in Scotland. The table shows an index of output in the manufacturing industries (SIC divisions 2 to 4) for Scotland together with estimates of employees in employment. Output per employee is also calculated and expressed in index form for comparative purposes.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total expenditure on the assisted places scheme in 1988-89 and the estimated expenditure in 1989-90, 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Lang: As regards the period 1989-91, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer he was given on 17 January. To achieve the planned increase in the number of children benefiting from the scheme I estimate that spending in 1991-92 could rise to £8·8 million.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of assisted places in independent schools for the following levels of family income: under £8,000 per annum, £8,000 to £12,000 per annum, £12,000 to £15,000 per annum and over £15,000 per annum for each of the years 1982-83 to 1988-89, inclusive.

Mr. Lang: The information is as follows:

School Year	Under £8,000	£8,000-£12,000	£12,000-£15,000	Over £15,000
1982-83	1,211	239	—	—

Lothian Health Board

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Lothian and Borders police on the progress of his investigations into Lothian health board.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Lothian and Borders police are investigating allegations of criminal conduct by employees of Lothian health board. The procurator fiscal at Edinburgh is being kept advised as to progress and will receive a full report from the police at the conclusion of the inquiries.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will detail any unforeseen losses incurred by Lothian health board during the current financial year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: It is not yet known whether Lothian health board has incurred any unforeseen losses in the current financial year.

Hospitals (Self-governing Status)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will accord pilot study status to those hospitals that first become self-governing trusts.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The early schemes will provide valuable, practical experience on how best to set up and manage self-governing NHS trusts and this will guide later developments.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he expects any acute hospitals to express an interest in becoming self-governing.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend looks forward to receiving expressions of interest from a wide range of types of hospital and services within the NHS, including acute hospitals.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the policy outlined in Scottish Working Paper No. 3 that self-governing status is likely to be particularly appropriate to major acute hospitals providing a reasonably comprehensive service, remains the case.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Yes, but all hospitals and a number of other services are potentially eligible.

Victoria Infirmary

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement regarding the proposed closure of laboratories at the Victoria infirmary, Glasgow.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The provision of laboratory services in its area is a matter for Greater Glasgow health board and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Infant Mortality

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his reply of 18 October to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan, Official Report, column 172, what account is taken in shaping health policies and measures for Scotland of infant mortality and its causes.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Account is taken of information, advice and recommendations in relation to infant mortality from a variety of sources. Perinatal and infant deaths in Scotland are the subject of continuous epidemiological audit. In addition, cognisance is taken of reports from advisory bodies and from professional colleges and associations. Research studies into specific causes of infant death are also undertaken. In the decade 1978 to 1987 the infant mortality rate in Scotland declined from 12·9 to 8·5 infant deaths per 1,000 live births.

Charities

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his proposals for improved regulation of charities in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend issued a statement, "Charities in Scotland: A Framework for Supervision" on Monday 23 October. Copies have been placed in the Library.

EMPLOYMENT

Member's Question

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) 28 July, Official Report column 1050, if he will set out (a) the reasons for not replying to the priority written question referred to and (b) the longest interval between the asking of a priority written question and its answer by his Department.

Mr. Nicholls: The question from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) of 17 April was answered on 28 July, Official Report, column 1049. Information on the longest interval between the asking of a priority written question and its answer by my Department is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

YTS

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by region, how many unfilled places there were on YTS at the most recently available date and at the same date one and two years previously.

Mr. Nicholls: The table shows the number of unfilled places by region as at August 1987, August 1988 and August 1989.

Number of unfilled YTS places by region as at August of 1987, 1988 and 1989

Region	1987	1988	1989
South East	22,000	18,400	19,900
London	18,000	11,400	10,200
South West	13,600	12,000	9,300

Wales	6,500	4,500	3,700
Scotland	12,900	12,800	10,700

Notes:
1. Figures are rounded to the nearest 100.
2. 1987 figures exclude continuation places for YTS1 trainees.

Employment Training

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures his Department is introducing to encourage members of ethnic minorities to take part in employment training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: My Department has already introduced a wide range of measures to encourage members of ethnic minorities to take part in Employment Training and has plans for further measures which include:

action to ensure that racial discrimination does not take place;

action to ensure that training is attractive to and meets the needs of members of ethnic minorities and;

action to ensure, through local marketing and publicity, that ethnic minority communities are aware of the programme.

The success of existing measures is clearly reflected in a 10 per cent. participation rate for trainees from ethnic minorities and my Department will continue to build upon this excellent beginning.

Nearly half the people in England who are taking advantage of ET are resident in inner cities. The proportion of inner city residents entering ET from ethnic minorities is 14 per cent. above the national average. These people will benefit from the special measures which were announced by my right hon. Friend on 9 March, from the appointment of inner city development officers and from a number of initiatives which have been locally planned to meet local needs.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for each of the Training Agency's areas within Greater London, Birmingham and Greater Manchester, what are the monthly statistics for each month since September 1988 for employment training showing (a) the number of trainees receiving employment training allowances, (b) the number of people receiving community programme wages, (c) the overall cumulative number of trainees in training for each month, and (d) the number of starts in each month with employment training training managers.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is given in the tables.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for each of the Training Agency's areas within Greater London, Birmingham and Greater Manchester, what are the latest available statistics for employment training giving a breakdown of entrants which shows how many were male and female, the length of time they had been out of work, their ethnic backgrounds and whether or not they had any disabilities.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is given in the table.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when information from the comprehensive employment training leavers survey will be available; and when a copy will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Nicholls: First questionnaires for the 100 per cent. follow-up survey of employment training leavers were sent out on 16 October. Information will be available later in the year.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what criteria are used when setting the price to the public of Health and Safety Executive publications including the annual report; and what has been the average profit yielded by these publications in each of the last five years.

Mr. Nicholls: In line with Her Majesty's Treasury rules, the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) operates a pricing policy which seeks to recover in full the costs of production. Information is not available for the last five years but the HSE has produced a memorandum trading account in each of the last three financial years as follows:

Year	Profit £
1986-87	306,000
1987-88	167,000
1988-89	150,000

Statistics (Swindon)

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the largest 15 categories of employment in the Swindon constituency in the last five years for which figures are available; how many were employed in each category; and what percentage of the total work force these represent.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is given in the table.

The available information from the censuses of employment taken in September 1984 and September 1987 is given in the table below Numbers and percentage of employees in employment[1] in the 15 industry classes with the largest number of employees in the Swindon constituency

Labour Statistics

Mr. Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report the estimate for the number of people in work in Great Britain for March in each year since 1970.

Mr. Nicholls: Estimates of the self-employed are based on the census of population and the labour force surveys. Prior to 1971 this information was obtained from the Department of Health and Social Security's sample of national insurance cards. The current surveys of work force in employment, including the self-employed, are therefore not comparable with data before 1971.

The available information is as follows:

Tourism

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether the English tourist board and the English regional tourism authorities, will be empowered to market their areas within the whole of the European Community from 1992 onwards.

Mr. Nicholls: Under the Development of Tourism Act 1969, the English tourist board can engage in marketing activities outside the United Kingdom on behalf of the British Tourist Authority, but not otherwise. In practice, the English tourist board does not engage in any marketing activity outside England. There are no plans to introduce any change to this position.

The English regional tourist boards are independent, non-statutory organisations, and are therefore free to carry out marketing activities both inside and outside the United Kingdom.

Noise at Work

Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many improvement notices for each of the last 10 years have been issued against employers relating to the control of noise at work for each of the geographical areas of, respectively, the factory inspectorate, mines and quarries inspectorate, agricultural inspectorate, and railway inspectorate.

Mr. Nicholls: The figures cover the period 1981-89. Information in the form requested is not available for 1979 and 1980.

Notes:

1. No proceedings were instituted for noise related offences by HSE's agricultural inspectorate, and mines and quarries inspectorate during the period 1981-89, or by the railway inspectorate.
2. The legislation under which this action was taken has recently been strengthened by the addition of new Noise at Work Regulations (SI 1989 No. 1790) coming into force next January, reflecting the Government's commitment to controlling noise at work.

Special Employment

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was (a) the total estimated number of people in special employment and training measures in each of the standard regions of England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland of the United Kingdom in March 1983 and March 1989 and (b) the change by number and percentage between March 1988 and March 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: The number of people starting special employment and training programmes in Great Britain in 1982-83 and 1988-89 is shown in the table. Figures for March only are not available, nor are regional analyses for 1982-83. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is responsible for similar measures there.

Wages Councils

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the evidence on which he based his assertions in the wages councils 1988 consultative document that the decline in youth unemployment is a direct result of young persons' removal from wages councils remit in 1986.

Mr. Nicholls: There were indications from employers that their freedom to offer jobs at rates they could afford had resulted in the engagement of young people who would not otherwise have been recruited. It follows that this has contributed to the decrease in youth unemployment.

PRIME MINISTER

Inner Cities Policies

Q8. Mr. Kirkhope: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the Government's inner cities policies.

The Prime Minister: Excellent progress continues to be made in the regeneration of our inner cities under the Government's Action for Cities programmes, spending on which is planned to increase to about £3·5 billion this year. Unemployment in the 57 inner city target areas has fallen by 23 per cent. over the last year.

Pakistan

Q18. Mr. Waller: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the United Kingdom's relations with Pakistan.

The Prime Minister: Our close and friendly relations with the democratic Government in Pakistan have been reinforced by Pakistan's recent resumption of Commonwealth membership. After Prime Minister Bhutto's welcome visit to Britain in July, I was pleased to renew my acquantance with her at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Kuala Lumpur last week.

Housing Policy

Q20. Mr. Fishburn: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding housing policy.

The Prime Minister: Many representations are received on housing policy. The Government's policies have encouraged the spread of owner-occupation which has increased by 3,600,000 homes since 1979, an increase in the total housing stock of nearly 2 million since 1979 and the highest number of private housing starts since 1972.

Legal Profession

Q21. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding reform of the legal profession.

The Prime Minister: I have received a number of representations both on the Government's consultation papers. Many support the Government's aim of securing for the public the best possible access to legal services of sound quality.

Countryside

Q27. Mr. Marland: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the preservation of the countryside.

The Prime Minister: Widespread appreciation has been expressed at this Government's determination to protect the countryside, and to recognise the interests of people who live and work there.

United States of America

Q45. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the United Kingdom's relations with the United States of America.

The Prime Minister: I regularly receive representations on a range of subjects from members of the public and from hon. Members of this House.

Education Policy

Q57. Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representatives regarding educational policy.

The Prime Minister: I receive many representations about education. The Government's educational policies, in particular the introduction of the national curriculum, will continue to raise standards at all levels.

National Heritage

Q60. Mr. William Powell: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the preservation of the national heritage.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friends and I receive representations frequently. Our heritage makes a particularly important contribution both to the quality of life within our communities and to the tourism industry. The Government are concerned to ensure that the nation's wealth of important historic buildings, monuments and sites are preserved wherever possible.

British Rail

Q64. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding British Rail.

The Prime Minister: Yes. Many welcome the current investment programme which at £4 billion over the next five years is the largest programme since the transition from steam to diesel 30 years ago.

Cawston, Rugby

Q80. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Prime Minister if she has any plans to pay an official visit to Cawston near Rugby.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Exeter

Q96. Mr. Hannam: To ask the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Exeter.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Water Act

Q99. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Prime Minister what representations she has received on the implementation of the Water Act.

The Prime Minister: We have received a wide range of representations on the subject of water privatisation generally. In our view this represents the best way of achieving even higher standards of water quality more quickly and more cost effectively.

Waste Disposal

Q104. Sir Hugh Rossi: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding waste disposal.

The Prime Minister: I receive representations from a variety of sources on a wide range of waste disposal issues.

USA President

Q108. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Prime Minister when she next proposes to meet the President of the United States of America.

The Prime Minister: I expect to meet President Bush again next month.

South Hams

Q135. Mr. Steen: To ask the Prime Minister if she will visit South Hams.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Transport Policy

Q149. Mr. Page: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding transport policy.

The Prime Minister: I regularly receive representations on a wide range of issues concerning transport policy.

Food Safety

Q152. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Prime Minister what recent representations she has received on food safety.

The Prime Minister: I have received a number of representations on a range of matters relating to food safety. These have been drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health. The Government's proposals on food safety have been set out in its White Paper published in July this year.

London Transport

Q155. Mr. Malins: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding London Transport.

The Prime Minister: I receive various representations concerning different aspects of London Regional Transport's operations.

EC Intergovernmental Conference

Q165. Mr. Cash: To ask the Prime Minister if she has received recent representations regarding the proposed intergovernmental conference in the European Community.

The Prime Minister: No such representations have been received.

Engagements

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 October.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 October.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 October.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 October.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 October.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 October.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 October.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 October.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Southern Africa

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's position on the Organisation of Africa Unity declaration on South Africa, adopted in Harare on 21 August.

The Prime Minister: We do not believe that it is for outsiders to prescribe constitutional solutions to South Africa's problems. South Africans themselves must decide their own future. However, we welcome signs that the ANC is now thinking seriously about a negotiating process.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if she will make a statement on the Commonwealth Heads of Government document, "Southern Africa: The Way Ahead.";

(2) if she will make a statement on the document, "Southern Africa: The Way Ahead: Britain's View."

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the statement I made earlier this afternoon.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy to call upon the Governments of the United States of America, the Nordic countries and others to maintain existing sanctions and other measures against South Africa, as agreed at the Kuala Lumpur meeting of the Heads of Government of the Commonwealth.

The Prime Minister: Britain agreed with all other Commonwealth countries at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting the passage in the Kuala Lumpur statement on Southern Africa

"that all existing sanctions and measures should be maintained and called upon the wider international community to do likewise."

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report a statement on the progress that Her Majesty's Government believe has been made towards dismantling the pillars of apartheid.

The Prime Minister: Progress towards the dismantling of apartheid has included the abolition of the pass laws and influx control, the ending of job reservation on a racial basis, the granting of freehold property rights to all South Africans, the legalisation of black trades unions and the lifting of many restrictions on black small businesses. There have also been substantial moves towards the desegregation of public amenities. The release of eight long-term security prisoners and the granting of permission for peaceful demonstrations are welcome steps in the right direction. We will continue to seek the total abolition of apartheid, including the repeal of the remaining discriminatory legislation which forms the legal basis of apartheid, and its peaceful replacement by a system of government acceptable to all South Africans.

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report, in relation to the document, "Southern Africa: The Way Ahead: Britain's View", when it was released, when it was decided to release the document and on which previous occasions Her Majesty's Government has issued a formal document of explanation further to a Commonwealth statement.

The Prime Minister: "Southern Africa: The Way Ahead: Britain's View" is not a formal document. It is a statement setting out our views on those passages of the Kuala Lumpur statement with which we disagreed and on how we see the way forward. At previous meetings of the Commonwealth Heads of Government I have expressed publicly Britain's views on matters which have arisen in discussion.

Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Prime Minister what percentage of letters from hon. Members to her received a reply (a) in under four weeks, (b) within four to six weeks, (c) within six to eight weeks and (d) over eight weeks, in each of the last three years.

The Prime Minister: This information is not held centrally and could therefore be provided only at disproportionate cost.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Screening

11. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received any representations from the public concerning the Metropolitan police crime screening ratios policy.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Representations about crime screening have been received in the course of consultation meetings which my right hon. Friend had earlier this year with London Conservative Members of Parliament and the London local authority associations.

Crime Prevention (West Cornwall)

13. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to help prevent crime in west Cornwall; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have a crime reduction strategy that applies to all parts of England and Wales. Central to this strategy is the involvement of the local community in crime prevention activity. Crime Concern was launched to support such activity and our national publicity campaign will continue to provide further advice to the public on ways in which they can reduce crime. In west Cornwall, I am pleased to report that there are now 100 neighbourhood watch schemes where 18 months ago there were none. Young people, too, are co-operating with the police. Youth crime prevention panels have been set up in Hayle with the assistance of schools liaison officers. The police and community of west Cornwall are enthusiastically working together to prevent crime.

Dogs

14. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further steps he intends to take to control the dog population in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Following the passage of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1989 I believe that effective steps have been taken to control the problem of dangerous dogs. The Act greatly improves the effectiveness of the courts' power to order the destruction of dangerous dogs and increases maximum penalties for offences.

Right to Silence

15. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to implement the proposals contained in the recent Home Office report on the right to silence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We are waiting for comments, which are requested by 25 January, before reaching a final view.

West Midlands Serious Crimes Squad

16. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands on the decision to disband the serious crimes squad; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Reid).

34. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of the recent decision to disband the West Midlands serious crimes squad, he will review convictions for serious crimes based wholly or mainly on confessions obtained from people in the custody of the West Midlands police.

47. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chief constable of the West Midlands; and what matters were discussed.

65. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of the recent decision to disband the West Midlands serious crimes squad, he will review all convictions for serious crimes based wholly or mainly on confessions obtained in the custody of the West Midlands police.

66. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands on the decision to disband the serious crimes squad; and if he will make a statement.

69. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands on the decision to disband the serious crimes squad; and if he will make a statement.

70. Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands on the decision to disband the serious crimes squad; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Members to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend to the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Reid).

19. Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the case of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings, in the light of recent evidence that officers of the West Midlands serious crimes squad have been forging confessions.

55. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the case of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings, in the light of recent evidence that officers of the West Midlands serious crimes squad have been forging confessions.

Mr. Hurd: I referred this case to the Court of Appeal on 20 January 1987 and after a thorough investigation by the Devon and Cornwall police, the court heard the case in November and December 1987. In its judgment, announced in January 1988, the court concluded that it had no doubt that the convictions were safe and satisfactory.

I am always ready to consider new evidence or other information which has not been before the courts and which appears to cast doubt on the safety of the conviction. We are in close touch with the Police Complaints Authority about the investigations into the allegations made about the West Midlands serious crime squad. If relevant information came to light in the course of the investigation, I should as I stated in the House on 19 October consider whether there were grounds to justify my further intervention in this or any other case.

Street Drinking

17. Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will report on Government initiatives to curb drinking in the street.

Mr. John Patten: The experimental byelaw, which prohibits the consumption of alcohol in designated public places, is now in force in seven areas. The operation of the byelaw is being closely monitored by participating local authorities, the police and the Home Office. The results so far are encouraging. The byelaw has maintained its initial popularity and continues to be generally complied with. There have been 10 prosecutions, with 11 pending.

Special Constables

18. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many special constables were appointed during the first half of 1988.

Mr. Hurd: On 31 December 1988 there were 15,778 special constables in England and Wales (10,578 men and 5,210 women). On 30 June 1989 there were 15,625 (10,465 men and 5,160 women). Statistics relating to appointments are not held centrally.

32. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many special constables now serve in police forces in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) earlier today.

Immigrants

20. Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his latest estimate of the number of immigrants allowed to enter Britain; and what are the figures for each of the previous five years.

Mr. Renton: In the 12 months ending 30 June 1989, a total of 50,200 persons were accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom. The corresponding figures for previous years were 53,500 in 1983, 51,000 in 1984, 55,400 in 1985, 47,800 in 1986, 46,000 in 1987 and 49,300 in 1988.

Neighbourhood Watch

21. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many neighbourhood watch schemes now exist in West Mercia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I understand from the West Mercia constabulary that at the end of September 1989 there were 2,928 schemes in West Mercia, covering approximately 73,000 households. This is an increase of 859 schemes compared with the position reported 12 months previously.

29. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many neighbourhood watch schemes now exist in Staffordshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I understand from the Staffordshire police that at the end of September 1989 there were 760 neighbourhood watch schemes in Staffordshire, covering approximately 84,000 households. This represents an increase of 228 schemes compared with the position reported 12 months previously.

36. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many neighbourhood watch schemes now exist; and if he will make a statement.

67. Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many neighbourhood watch schemes now exist in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: At the end of September 1989 there were estimated to be in the region of 75,300 residential neighbourhood watch schemes in England and Wales. The total number of schemes is almost 16,000 more than recorded 12 months ago and covers well over 3·5 million households. In addition the original neighbourhood watch idea has diversified to include initiatives such as pub watch, business watch, taxi watch and farm watch schemes. I welcome this evidence of the public's continuing support for crime prevention in general and neighbourhood watch in particular.

59. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many neighbourhood watch schemes now exist in Kent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I understand from the Kent constabulary that at the end of September 1989 there were 1,604 neighbourhood watch schemes in Kent, covering approximately 201,000 households. This is an increase of some 280 schemes compared with the position reported 12 months previously.

"Practical Ways to Crack Crime"

22. Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many copies of "Practical Ways to Crack Crime" have now been distributed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Nearly 2·5 million copies of the first and second editions of "Practical Ways to Crack Crime" have been distributed in England and Wales. The third edition was published yesterday.

Forensic Science Service

23. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to improve the effectiveness of the forensic science service.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Following the publication of its strategy statement in May 1989, the forensic science service has prepared a comprehensive programme of action aimed at improving both its effectiveness and efficiency. Copies of both the strategy statement and the more detailed action programme are in the Library.

Homelessness

24. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest figures for the level of prosecutions, under sections 3 and 4 of the Vagrancy Act 1824, for homeless young people in London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The number of persons aged under 21 proceeded against in the Metropolitan police district under sections 3 and 4 of the Vagrancy Act 1824 for 1987 was 171. Information is not collected centrally on the number of homeless people who have been prosecuted under the aforesaid Act. However of the 171 prosecutions only four were for sleeping out. This compares with 66 for being on enclosed premises for an unlawful purpose, 49 for indecent exposure and 38 for begging. Data for 1988 are not yet available.

Drug Traffickers

25. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress is being made towards concluding further international agreements to confiscate the assests of convicted drug traffickers.

54. Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress is being made towards concluding further international agreements to confiscate the assets of convicted drug traffickers.

Mr. John Patten: We have concluded reciprocal agreements or arrangements with 11 countries: the United States, Australia, Canada, the Bahamas, Bermuda, Spain, Switzerland, Nigeria, Anguilla, Gibraltar and Malaysia. An agreement with Sweden is also near completion and negotiations are under way with several other countries.

57. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will report the latest available totals for drug traffickers' assets confiscated or frozen pending trial.

Mr. John Patten: The information available centrally relates only to confiscation orders made under the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986. For 1988, £8·1 million was ordered to be confiscated by the courts. The national drugs intelligence unit estimates that confiscation and restraint orders exceeding £13 million and £20 million respectively have been made since the Act came into force in January 1987.

61. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drugs trafficking offences were recorded and successfully prosecuted during the past 12 months.

Mr. John Patten: The information available centrally indicates that 9,214 offences of trafficking in controlled drugs were dealt with in the United Kingdom in 1988. A total of 4,208 persons were found guilty of 5,600 of these offences and a further 811 persons were cautioned or dealt with by compounding (payment of a penalty in lieu of prosecution) for a single offence.

Policing

26. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for increased policing throughout the United Kingdom over the next 12 months.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend will be able to approve 1,100 additional police posts for police forces in England and Wales in 1990-91.

Cocaine and Crack

27. Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to combat the threat from cocaine and crack.

63. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made towards targeting publicity campaigns warning of the dangers of crack in certain key cities.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply my right hon. Friend gave earlier to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord).

Mr. Colin Wallace

28. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on the conduct of the Sussex police force when investigating the murder charge against Mr. Colin Wallace.

Mr. John Patten: We have received representations from the hon. Member and from Mr. Colin Wallace. I hope to be able to let them have a substantive reply to their representations shortly.

Police (Norfolk)

30. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress is being made towards securing greater efficiency and value for money by the police service in Norfolk; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for securing value for money in the Norfolk constabulary rests primarily on the chief constable and the police authority. Among the initiatives taken in pursuit of better value for money are a programme of civilianisation including the setting up of administrative support units which has released 112 officers to operational duties since 1981; sharing underused police premises with other services; putting police canteens out to competitive tendering; and a review of vehicle fleet management.

Slopping Out (Prisons)

31. Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to end the practice of slopping out within prisons.

Mr. Hurd: As I indicated in a reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis) on 20 February 1989 at column 506, we accept that ending slopping out would make a substantial difference to the lives of prisoners and staff, and that achieving this should be given a high priority. Work is under way to reach this goal, with all prisons built or designed since 1979 having either integral sanitation within the living accommodation or free access to sanitation. At existing establishments, the introduction of sanitary facilities is proceeding as quickly as possible within financial and physical constraints. I also announced a provisional programme to add more than 6,500 cells to those already scheduled for conversion. In addition, each establishment which does not have integral sanitation, or where it has not already been scheduled to be included, is being examined to determine the best way of providing such access, taking account of its individual circumstances. We thus plan to reduce the number of places without access to sanitation as quickly as possible, though it is not yet possible to say exactly when the practice will finally cease.

Shotgun Certificates

33. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from chief constables in England and Wales on the steps they are taking to satisfy themselves that applicants for shotgun certificates can possess these weapons without danger to the public safety or the peace.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend has issued guidance to chief officers of police on this matter in the publication entitled "Firearms Law: Guidance to the Police", a copy of which is in the Library. Her Majesty's inspectors of constabulary give considerable attention to this aspect in their inspections of forces.

Fines

35. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many fines were imposed by courts in June 1989, March 1989, December 1988 and September 1988.

Mr. John Patten: The information for 1988 and 1989 is not yet available.

48. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to receive and make public the findings of the five assessment projects on the feasibility of day fines and the causes of the decline in the use of fines as punishment.

Mr. John Patten: Autumn 1990: the project includes following up the enforcement of the fines assessed on a unit basis.

War Crimes Report

37. Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement in respect of comments received by his Department on the war crimes report.

Mr. John Patten: Since the war crimes inquiry's report was published, we have received a considerable number of letters representing a range of differing arguments of principle and practicality raised by the issue of war crimes prosecutions. We hope that it will be possible for the House to debate the issues raised by the report shortly.

Orange Badges

38. Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will discuss with chief constables measures which would make it easier for police and traffic wardens to identify misuse of orange badges by able-bodied people.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given to his question on 20 July 1989 at column 301.

Turkish Kurds

39. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in deciding applications for political asylum by Turkish Kurds.

Mr. Renton: By 11 October the asylum applications from 592 Turkish nationals had been considered in detail. The results of this consideration are that 71 met the criteria of the 1951 UN convention and have been recognised as refugees; 243 have been given leave to remain in the United Kingdom on an exceptional basis; 24 departed voluntarily before a final decision was reached; 172 have been notified of a provisional decision that they do not qualify for asylum and further information/representations are awaited; 36 did not qualify for asylum or leave to enter under the immigration rules, were refused entry and returned to Turkey.

In addition, a further 207 have made voluntary departures after withdrawing their claims for asylum.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of Kurds currently seeking asylum in the United Kingdom and of those the number in custody in (a) Her Majesty's prisons and (b) detention centres.

Mr. Renton: Immigration statistics do not record ethnic origins, but most of the 4,200 Turkish nationals currently seeking asylum in the United Kingdom are believed to be of Kurdish origin. Six Turkish asylum seekers, whose applications have been refused and who await removal, are currently detained, all in prisons.

Police Statistics

40. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the increase in police numbers since October 1979.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Between October 1979 and July 1989 police officer strength increased by 12,925 to 125,808.

Police Service (Cambridgeshire)

41. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress is being made towards securing greater efficiency and value for money by the police service in Cambridgeshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for securing value for money in the Cambridgeshire constabulary rests primarily on the chief constable and police authority.

In pursuit of better value for money Cambridgeshire constabulary has undertaken, amongst other things, the following initiatives: the introduction of a comprehensive performance review system; reduction in the number of tiers of management and clarification of management responsibilities; streamlining paperwork to reduce time spent by officers on administrative tasks; the introduction of graded response to calls; and civilianisation of police officer posts.

The chief constable has identified a number of other areas for further work to improve value for money, including transport and communications.

Safer Cities Initiative

42. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress is being made with his Department's safer cities initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Progress is good. Eleven local safer cities projects are now operating and five more should be in place by next January. Resulting action to reduce crime, and fear of crime, encompasses well-tried physical security and other more innovative measures. Examples are better fittings in homes of the elderly and in business premises; improved lighting in car parks and streets; personal safety classes; and new activity for young people at risk of offending.

Her Majesty's Inspector of Prisons (Report)

43. Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received following the publication on 24 July of the report of Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons 1988.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As yet we have received no representations on this report.

Crime (Bury)

44. Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to help prevent crime in Bury; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Our strategy for crime prevention applies to all parts of England and Wales. We have substantially increased police manpower and resources, set up Crime Concern to stimulate, support and develop local crime prevention activity, and have launched this month the third phase of our national crime prevention advertising campaign which will provide further advice for the public on how they can help to reduce crime. The Government encourage the growth and development of neighbourhood watch schemes and crime prevention panels and I am pleased to note that there are now 401 watch schemes in Bury, North compared to 259 this time last year. I know also that the Bury and district crime prevention panel has run successful campaigns against shoplifting and recently organised a major crime prevention exhibition.

Television Licences

45. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the implementation of the new regulations relating to concessionary television licences; and what representations he has received from local authorities on this matter.

Mr. Renton: By the end of August 1989 about 27,000 schemes had been reviewed under the May 1988 regulations, and some 804,500 people were covered by concessionary licences. Applications in respect of a further 10,000 schemes are being considered by the national TV licence records office and it is hoped that they will be dealt with by the end of the year. Since the change in the regulations, we have received 62 letters, 52 through hon. Members, from local authorities about aspects of the concessionary television licence scheme. I have also received two delegations from local authorities.

Chief Constable of Essex

46. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chief constable of Essex; and what was discussed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend last met the chief constable of Essex on 21 September when he opened the new police station at Colchester. They touched on a number of matters during the brief conversation which the occasion allowed.

Remand Prisoners

49. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of remand prisoners held in custody during 1988 later received a custodial sentence.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information for 1988 is incomplete because for a proportion of the prisoners the outcome of court proceedings is not yet recorded. Final figures for 1987 and provisional figures for 1988 are given in tables 2.10 and 2.6 respectively of "Prison Statistics England and Wales 1988", published today, which is available in the Library.

Broadcasting Standards Council

50. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress the Broadcasting Standards Council is making towards its code of conduct.

Mr. Renton: I understand that the Broadcasting Standards Council has completed work on its code of practice on the portrayal of sex and violence in broadcast programmes and video works, and that it will be published along with the council's annual report on 1 November.

Police Officers (Administrative Support)

51. Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to implement the recommendations of the Audit Commission report on administrative support for police officers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Audit Commission recommendations in its report on administrative support for police officers contain valuable guidelines for improved value for money in the use of police resources. Responsibility for responding to the recommendations lies primarily with chief officers of police and local police authorities with the advice and encouragement of Her Majesty's inspectors of constabulary. A survey carried out by the inspectorate last June showed that over 90 per cent. of forces had completed or were carrying out reviews of their administrative support services.

Nationality Applications

52. Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in dealing with nationality applications at the Liverpool nationality office.

Mr. Renton: Excellent progress continues to be made. The number of applications currently outstanding is less than 40,000. As I indicated to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on 26 July at column 709, we expect to have taken decisions on all these applications by January 1990.

Metropolitan Police

53. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress is being made towards securing greater efficiency and value for money by the police service in the London metropolitan area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: A wide range of initiatives is being pursued to improve value for money in the Metropolitan police. They include a programme of civilianisation, which has released more than 360 officers for operational duties since April 1986; an annual programme of efficiency scrutinies with seven scrutinies completed to date; the introduction of external inspections by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary; improvements in resource planning and central processes, including the development of output measures and performance indicators and targets, progressive delegation of budgets to areas and divisions and improvements in financial management information; wide-ranging reviews by external consultants, including reviews of provisioning services and of building project management; appointment of specialist procurement and accounting advisers; and numerous other internal reviews. Further details on value for money activity may be found in the Commissioner's report for 1988 (Cm. 670).

National Investigation Bureau

56. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Commissioner of the Metropolitan police about proposals to create a national investigative bureau; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have not received any formal representations, but we welcome the views the Commissioner expressed in his speech to the Police Foundation on 6 July as being an important contribution to the debate on the organisation of policing to combat the challenge of serious crime. At this stage I believe that it would be premature to create an operational national unit to investigate serious crime, which would involve a substantial reorganisation of our present police force structures. Co-ordination of criminal intelligence is, however, essential. I am, therefore, asking the police service to consider how we might build on the excellent work of the regional crime squads, the national drugs intelligence unit and the national football intelligence unit to improve the collection and dissemination of criminal intelligence about all kinds of serious crime, perhaps by the creation of a national criminal intelligence unit.

Broadcasting

58. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what subjects he expects to discuss at his next meeting with representatives of the broadcasting authorities.

Mr. Renton: I have regular meetings with the broadcasting authorities at which a wide range of broadcasting issues are discussed.

Gaelic Broadcasting

60. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a further statement on the future role envisaged for Gaelic broadcasting.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend hopes before long to be in a position to make an announcement on Gaelic broadcasting.

Hong Kong Citizens

62. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many citizens of Hong Kong have been granted abode in the United Kingdom over the past five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Renton: The number of British dependent territory citizens from Hong Kong granted settlement in the United Kingdom in the years 1984 to 1988 is published in table 22 of the Home Office Command Paper "Control of Immigration: Statistics; United Kingdom 1988" (Cm. 726), a copy of which is in the Library.

Police Officials (Removals)

64. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress his Department has made on proposals that would lead to the removal of inefficient police officials; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This issue is still under consideration by a committee of the Police Advisory Board. I expect it to be discussed at the committee's next meeting on 15 November.

Violence and Sex (Television)

68. Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from ethnic minorities about violence and sex on television.

Mr. Renton: We receive a number of letters about the portrayal of sex and violence on television, but have not received any specifically from ethnic minority groups.

EC Border Control

71. Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about border control between the United Kingdom and other European community countries.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox).

Burials

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice has been given to registrars in England in easing the formalities for the burial in England of persons who have died in Scotland.

Mr. Freeman: I have been asked to reply.

Registrars are advised to obtain documentary evidence of the place and cause of death of persons who die in Scotland where it is intended that the burial or cremation take place in England or Wales.

The registrars general for England and Wales and for Scotland have recently agreed revised written instructions which will shortly be circulated to registrars in England and Wales, advising that the appropriate documentary evidence would include either a certified extract of an entry in a Scottish death register, or a letter from the procurator fiscal stating the place and cause of death.

I understand that similar instructions are about to be issued to registrars in Scotland so that they can give advice on the documentary evidence required in England and Wales in such cases.

Passports

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has considered, as recommended in the fifth report of the Home Affairs Select Committee (1987-88 session), the withdrawal of the British visitor's passport and the issue of the back page of the new United Kingdom passport as a voluntary identification document to facilitate travel within the European Community and to replace the growing number of cards now being issued by football clubs, public houses and other private establishments for the purposes of identification; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: As explained in the Government's reply to the Committee's fifth report (Cm. 635), no decision about withdrawal or replacement of the British visitor's passport can be made until the main passport issuing system has been fully computerised and tested under a full workload.

Prisons

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many staff and of what grades are to be recruited or transferred to posts at (a) Her Majesty's Garth prison and (b) Her Majesty's Wymott prison (i) over the next six months and (ii) over the following six months;

(2) how many staff and of what grades are to be redeployed from (a) Her Majesty's remand centre, Risley and (b) Her Majesty's young offenders institution, Buckley Hall (i) over the next six months and (ii) over the following six months.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In his statement on 25 July 1989 about action to be taken in the light of the Risley disturbances, at columns 607-8, my right hon. Friend indicated that he had decided to work towards the end of Risley's remand function for males by the summer of next year, after which it would take only sentenced prisoners. The staffing requirement for the establishment after these changes have been made has not yet been precisely set, but it is expected that more than 200 staff—mainly from the prison service unified grades—will need to be redeployed. An exercise has been mounted to establish the wishes of the staff, which will be met so far as possible.

My right hon. Friend has recently decided that the young offender institution at Buckley Hall should close and it will cease to function on 12 November, with formal closure some time thereafter. Arrangements are being made for the staff—as shown in the table—to be redeployed.

Movements of staff into other establishments in the north-west, including those mentioned by my hon. Friend, depend on a number of factors, and I cannot say at this stage how many such movements there will be. Priority in filling such vacancies will, however, be given to staff transferred from Risley and Buckley Hall, and it is therefore unlikely that any newly recruited staff will be posted to Garth or Wymott.

Pub Bombings

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what time and on what day Gerry Conlon was informed formally of the Director of Public Prosecution's decision not to contest his appeal against the Guildford and Woolwich pub bombing convictions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand that the Crown Prosecution Service informed Mr. Conlon's solicitor of the Director of Public Prosecution's decision at about 11 am on Tuesday 17 October (one hour before the press notice). The solicitor was advised of Mr. Conlon's arrival at Brixton prison the same afternoon and she was able to speak to Mr. Conlon later in the day. There was no formal announcement of these events by the prison authorities.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what time and on what day Patrick Armstrong was informed formally of the Director of Public Prosecution's decision not to contest his appeal against the Guildford and Woolwich pub bombing convictions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand that the Crown Prosecution Service informed Mr. Armstrong's solicitor of the Director of Public Prosecution's decision at about 11 am on Tuesday 17 October (one hour before the press notice). The solicitor was advised of Mr. Armstrong's arrival at Brixton prison the same afternoon and he was able to speak to Mr. Armstrong later in the day. There was no formal announcement of these events by the prison authorities.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what time and on what day Paul Hill was informed formally of the Director of Public Prosecution's decision not to contest his appeal against the Guildford and Woolwich pub bombing convictions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand that the Crown Prosecution Service informed Mr. Hill's solicitor of the Director of Public Prosecution's decision at about 11 am on Tuesday 17 October (one hour before the press notice). The solicitor was advised of Mr. Hill's arrival at Brixton prison the same afternoon and he was able to speak to Mr. Hill later in the day. There was no formal announcement of these events by the prison authorities.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will name those who have been involved in the administration of justice who have sought to have the case of those convicted of the Birmingham bombing put before the courts again.

Mr. John Patten: Since the case of those convicted of the Birmingham public house bombings was last considered by the Court of Appeal following a reference by my right hon. Friend, representations proposing that the case be referred again to the Court of Appeal have been received from members of both Houses of Parliament, representatives of the clergy, representatives of various campaign groups, and members of the public. Some of these have legal qualifications.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) on how many occasions Gerry Conlon was strip-searched between 1 pm Tuesday 17 October and his release on Thursday 19 October;

(2) on how many occasions Patrick Armstrong was strip-searched between 1 pm Tuesday 17 October and his release;

(3) on how many occasions Paul Hill was strip-searched between 1 pm Tuesday 17 October and his release.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Comprehensive records of this kind are not routinely maintained, but it would be normal practice for them to have been strip-searched on arrival at Brixton prison, before and after receiving visits, and before their appearance at the Court of Appeal on Thursday 19 October; a total of about half a dozen occasions. It is standard practice to strip-search Category A prisoners on such occasions.

Terence William Rivett

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date Terence William Rivett escaped from HM prison, Ford, where he was serving a sentence of three years' imprisonment imposed at Guildford Crown court.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Terence William Rivett absconded from Ford open prison on 25 August 1989.

Criminal Cases Appeal

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on deciding whether to reconsider a previous decision not to refer criminal cases to appeal; and if he takes into account the later views of the judge who had dismissed a particular appeal at the time.

Mr. John Patten: In deciding whether to refer to the Court of Appeal, under section 17 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, the case of a person convicted on indictment, my right hon. Friend would normally consider it right to intervene whether there is new evidence or other consideration of substance which has not previously been before the courts, and which appears to cast doubt upon the safety of the conviction. If any member of the judiciary expressed views on the safety of a conviction my right hon. Friend would consider these very carefully.

Fostering

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many children of West African origin were left by their parents for fostering in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years; and if he will set out in each case the main categories by percentage of the immigration status of the children so left.

Mr. Renton: The information requested is not available. There is no provision in the immigration rules for the admission of children to be fostered in the United Kingdom. Under the rules children may settle here if their parents are also settled here. Children may also be admitted temporarily either as visitors or with parents who come here for a limited period, for example as students or work permit holders. A child admitted for a limited period would become an overstayer if he did not depart when his leave to remain expired.

Dr. Siddiqui

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the immigration status of the Dr. Siddiqui who recently addressed a meeting on the subject of Salman Rushdie.

Mr. Renton: He is a British citizen.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what is the average time taken between awards being made from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board and the issue of cheques for such awards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The board does not keep the information requested, but I understand that once an applicant has written to accept an offered award it will normally be paid in a few weeks.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time taken to make awards on claims to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) on 17 October at column 16.

Trespassing

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends undertaking an evaluation of the working of section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: Section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986 was introduced into the Public Order Bill as it was going through Parliament in response to the depredations suffered by landowners by members of the so-called peace convoy during the summer of 1986. The section provides the police with a power to direct trespassers to leave land in certain circumstances. Only if the trespassers knowingly fail to obey such a direction do they commit a criminal offence.

Section 39 put in place entirely new powers for the police and introduced an accompanying criminal sanction. It has been in force for about two and a half years. It has been the subject of representations by a number of people and organisations. In view of the time the section has been operative and because of the interest it has aroused I propose to institute an evaluation of how the section is working in order to obtain a clearer picture of the consistency and effectiveness of its application. Views on the section may be directed in writing to F8 Division, Home Office, 50 Queen Anne's Gate, London SW1H 9AT, to arrive by 31 December 1989.

Race Relations Act 1976

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what guidance the Department issues with regard to the meaning of "appropriate arrangements" in section 71 of the Race Relations Act 1976;

(2) what monitoring arrangements his Department operates to ensure that section 71 of the Race Relations Act 1976 is carried out by all local authorities.

Mr. John Patten: The joint circular 54/77, sent with the Race Relations Act 1976 to local authorities, advised them to examine their policies and practices for carrying out their different functions to ensure that they met the requirements of section 71, and to keep their employment policies and practices under regular review to ensure equality of opportunity for members of minority groups. No special monitoring arrangements are made by the Home Office.

Genetic Fingerprinting

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish figures of immigration cases where DNA has proved a positive relationship where entry has previously been refused for (a) those still under 18 years of age and (b) those who have passed their 18th birthday subsequent to entry refusal.

Mr. Renton: The information requested is not available. DNA evidence can be produced at any stage of the entry clearance or appeals process. Statistics relating to entry clearance applications granted or appeals allowed do not identify the number of cases which were resolved on the basis of DNA evidence or the number of such cases previously refused on relationship grounds.

Immigration (Body Searches)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines are given on the circumstances in which immigration officials should undertake body searches; and how many such searches were made in the last year.

Mr. Renton: Paragraph 4(3) of schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971 provides that an immigration officer may search the baggage and person of passengers seeking entry to ascertain whether they are carrying relevant documents, but no woman or girl may be searched except by a woman. Immigration officers normally seek the co-operation of HM Customs in any search of a passenger's baggage or person which may be considered necessary. In practice immigration officers do not carry out body searches and no guidelines on this have therefore been issued.

Police Records

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines there are for chief constables on how long they should keep records on individuals who have committed no crime which were collected prior to a security-sensitive event which has subsequently passed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None. This is an operational matter for chief constables.

Prisoners (Health Care)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to ensure that prisoners enjoy the same rights in relation to health care as the general population except that of being able to choose their doctor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Every prison has a medical officer who is statutorily responsible for the health care, mental and physical, of the prisoners held therein. All medical officers are bound by the prison or young offender institution rules and by prison standing orders which inter alia require 24-hour availability of doctors for regular surgeries and emergencies and allow medical officers unfettered clinical freedom to call upon such National Health Service and other specialist out-patient and in-patient services as they consider appropriate. Such services are used extensively.

Unconvicted prisoners may be treated by a doctor or dentist of their choice in consultation with the medical officer if certain conditions are satisfied.

Immigration

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the numbers of extra staff required by the immigration and nationality department to clear the backlog of immigration and nationality cases by 31 December.

Mr. Renton: The information requested is not readily available. Efforts to reduce the backlog by improved efficiency and streamlining caseworking procedures continue. The backlog of nationality registration applications is planned to be cleared during January 1990, and of naturalisation applications by 31 March 1991.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current backlog of immigration applications in terms of (a) the total number of cases, (b) the number in each category and (c) the average length of time it takes to deal with a case in each category.

Mr. Renton: At the end of September 1989, there were 27,600 cases outstanding in the immigration caseworking groups and 10,000 active cases in the refugee and special cases unit. Information by category on the number of cases currently outstanding is not readily available, but marriage and student cases are thought to account for the greater part of the backlog. The estimated average length of time to deal with applications in the main variation of leave categories in the third quarter of 1989 is given in the table:

Estimated average length of time between the receipt of an application and the decision, for variation of leave cases[1] [2] decided in the third quarter of 1989, for the main categories of applications

1989 Third Quarter

Category of application	Months
Student	3½
Work permit holder	1½
Settlement grant	2½
Limited leave prior to settlement as a spouse	4
Visitor	2

[1] Includes cases decided in the Public Enquiry Offices as well as in the caseworking groups.

[2] Excludes EC nationals.

Immigration and Nationality Department

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number and location of the sites suggested by the consultants employed by his Department for the possible relocation of the immigration and nationality department; and what was the cost of the consultants' work.

Mr. Renton: The consultants considered the broad potential benefits that might be secured from relocating in a number of areas. These were the north-east, north-west, west midlands, south Wales, Glasgow and central Birmingham. They made no specific recommendations regarding possible sites. The cost of the consultants' work was £70,100. Their report is still under consideration.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of staff vacancies at (a) the immigration and nationality department, Croydon and (b) the immigration and nationality department, Liverpool.

Mr. Renton: At 19 October there were 50 vacancies in the immigration and nationality department in Croydon, and two in the Liverpool nationality office.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of applications for registration which were completed by the immigration and nationality department in (a) 1987, (b) 1988, and (c) the current year to date.

Mr. Renton: The information is as follows:

Year	Applications for registration completed
1987	51,291
1988	53,947
[1]1989	79,605

[1] Provisional figure to end September.

Naturalisation

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of applications for naturalisation dealt with and completed by his Department in (a) 1986, (b) 1987, (c) 1988, and (d) the current year to date.

Mr. Renton: The information is as follows:

Year	Applications for naturalisation completed
1986	15,213
1987	20,180
1988	15,772
[1]1989	16,194

[1] Provisional figure to end September.

Illegal Abortions

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, by year and location, for the last five years, the number of successful prosecutions in respect of illegal abortion operations and the ages of the patients.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information available to me relates to the number of persons found guilty of procuring illegal abortions under the Offences against the Person Act 1861, sections 58 and 59 as amended by the Abortion Act 1967, in England and Wales by police force area for 1983 to 1987.

Police force area	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987

Metropolitan police district	1	—	—	—	—
Norfolk	1	—	—	—	—
South Yorkshire	—	1	—	1	—
England and Wales	3	2	—	2	—

Data for 1988 is not yet available. Information is not collected centrally on the age of the patients.

Fire Service

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the future of the fire service.

Mr. John Patten: The Government wish to see the fire service in Great Britain maintain the present high level of service while giving the best value for money to the public. It is the Government's view that this can be achieved within existing administrative structures.

Sir Peter Blaker : To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to privatise the fire service.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my right hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) on 10 January.

Lorrain Osman

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to answer recent correspondence from the hon. Member for Stockton, South about Mr. Lorrain Osman.

Mr. John Patten: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 25 October.

HEALTH

GP Referrals

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research projects are being carried out in the Trent regional health authority into the pattern of general practitioner referrals; where they are taking place; if he will give details of the research; and how much of this is in connection with hospitals considering opting out.

Mr. Mellor: We do not hold this information centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of Trent regional health authority for the information he requires.

Occupational and Speech Therapists

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each regional health authority the numbers of occupational and speech therapists in 1979, 1984 and 1988.

Mr. Freeman: The information is shown in the table.

DRG plc

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in the light of the work of DRG plc in the distribution of medical packaging products to the National Health Service, what consideration his Department has given to the effect of the bid for DRG plc by Pembridge Investments of Bermuda and any resulting sale of DRG Hospital Supplies on competition within the supply of such products to the National Health Service; whether his Department has made a submission to the Office of Fair Trading; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Officials have received representations concerning the bid both from DRG and Pembridge Investments Ltd. At the request of the Office of Fair Trading written comments have been passed to them which will be taken into account with other advice received. I am not aware that the bid will necessarily result in the sale of DRG Hospital Supplies and it would be my intention to ensure as far as possible that effective competition and security of supply was maintained for the NHS in this area of medical packaging.

Practice Budgets

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what will be the effect on patient care of the proposals to allow large general practitioners practices to hold their own budgets.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend, the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) on 27 June at column 417.

Private Ambulance Companies

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what requirements in respect of experience, competence, or probity he lays down or recommends to the regional or district health authorities in respect of proprietors or managers of private ambulance companies whose vehicles are hired to them at public expense;

(2) what requirements in respect of qualifications, experience or health he lays down or recommends to regional or district health authorities in respect of personnel employed by private ambulance companies whose services they use at public expense;

(3) what requirements, standards or specifications he lays down or recommends to regional or district health authorities in respect of the minimum standards of private ambulances hired or contracted to them and paid out of public funds.

Mr. Freeman: Health authorities are responsible for the day-to-day management of National Health Service ambulance services. It is for these authorities to arrange the most appropriate, efficient and cost effective means of transport for each of the patients the ambulance service is asked to convey. This may involve the use of private services. Requirements in respect of qualifications and experience are not set centrally: health authorities are responsible for negotiating contracts locally and for setting standards of service, patient care, and safety.

Cash Limits

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any changes will be made in the cash limits of his Department for 1989-90.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, the following changes will be made.

The cash limit for class XIV vote 1 (Hospital and community health and other services, England) will be increased by £47,879,000 (from £11,861,947,000 to £11,909,826,000). This increase provides an additional £32,000,000 for expenditure in connection with the implementation of the NHS review; £17,340,000 for the carry forward of underspends under the end year flexibility arrangements as announced by my right hon. Friend and Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 20 July 1989; and £539,000 in respect of a transfer from class XIV, vote 3 (subhead G2) for a management communications programme to inform NHS staff about the NHS review proposals. These increases are partly offset by a reduction of £2,000,000 in respect of a transfer to class XIV, vote 3 (subhead G3) for AIDS publicity.

The cash limit for class XIV, vote 3 (Department of Health, administration, miscellaneous health services and personal social services, England) will be increased by £8,891,000 (from £688,170,000 to £677,061,000). This increase provides an additional £7,400,000 for expenditure on Departmental administration in connection with the NHS review; £2,000,000 for a transfer from class XIV, vote 1 for AIDS publicity; and £30,000 for a transfer from class XV, vote 7 to adjust the apportionment of resources following the split of the former Department of Health and Social Security. These increases are partly offset by £539,000 in respect of a transfer to class XIV, vote 1 for a management communications programme to inform NHS staff about the NHS review proposals. As a result of the changes on this vote, the Department's running costs limit is increased by £7,341,000 from £238,815,000 to £246,156,000.

The net effect of these changes will be charged to the Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

OPCS

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has made any changes to both the cash and gross running costs limits for the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys for 1989-90.

Mr. Freeman: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class XX, vote 15 will be increased by £1,515,000 from £30,253,000 to £31,768,000. This increase reflects the carry forward of £192,000 underspend on running costs in 1988-89 under the end-year flexibility scheme and increased provision of £485,000 for work to correct NHS statistics held on the family practitioner committee systems; the carry forward of £323,000 underspend on capital in 1988-89 under the end-year flexibility scheme; an additional £1,000,000 to allow for greater computer capacity for system development work on the 1991 census (this represents a timing change within the overall 1991 census expenditure); increased capital provision of £200,000 for processing the 1991 census of Scotland. The costs to correct the NHS statistics and for processing the 1991 census of Scotland will be met from within the respective existing resources of the Department of Health and the General Register Office (Scotland). Both of these costs will be balanced by an equivalent increase in appropriations-in-aid. The balance of the increase will be charged to the Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

The OPCS gross running cost limit for class XX, vote 15 will be increased by £677,000 from £35,377,000 to £36,054,000 as a result of these changes.

Insulin

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths and adverse reactions have been reported since the introduction of human insulin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Since December 1982 the Committee on Safety of Medicines has received just over 100 reports of adverse reactions which may be associated with human insulin. In four of these cases the patient died. A report of a suspected adverse reaction does not necessarily mean there is a causal relationship with the drug so it does not follow, that human insulin was responsible for the reported deaths.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which companies manufacture human insulin; what warnings they gave to those taking the insulin; whether these were approved by the Committee on Safety of Medicines; and whether the warnings have been changed.

Mr. Mellor: Product licences for human insulin are held by:

The Wellcome Foundation
Lilly Industries
Fisons Ltd.
Nordisk UK Ltd.
Novo Laboratories Ltd.
Novo Industries

Patient information leaflets for human insulin give a range of warnings covering such subjects as pregnancy, illness, taking other medicines, taking physical exercise and drinking alcohol. All patient information leaflets are approved by the licensing authority. All manufacturers of human insulin agreed to include an additional warning that a few patients who experienced hypoglycaemic reactions after transfer to human insulin have reported that the early warning symptoms were less pronounced or different from those experienced with their previous insulin.

Whooping Cough Vaccine

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what circumstances his Department recommends that whooping cough vaccine should not be given; and what are the recommendations of the manufacturers.

Mr. Freeman: The recommendations of the joint committee on vaccination and immunisation, which the Department has accepted and which are published in the memorandum "Immunisation Against Infectious Disease", advise that if a child is suffering from any acute illness, vaccination against whooping cough should be postponed until the child has fully recovered; and that vaccination should not be given to children who have a history of severe local or general reaction to a preceding dose. "Local" and "general" are defined in the memorandum.

The JCVI also advises in the memorandum that there are certain groups of children for whom the advisability of whooping cough vaccination requires special consideration because of their own or their families histories. In such children the risk from vaccine may be higher, but the effects of the disease could be more severe. If the doctor is in doubt, he should seek advice from a consultant paediatrician or specialist in community medicine. These groups are:

(1) children with a documented history of cerebral damage in the neonatal period;
(2) children with a personal history of convulsions;
(3) children whose parents or siblings have a history of idiopathic epilepsy—in such children there may be a risk of developing a similar condition irrespective of vaccination.

The manufacturer of whooping couch vaccine is bound by the terms of the product licences granted to the company for its manufacture, sale and supply as a prescription-only medicine.

Cancer Screening and Immunisation

Mr. Haselhurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the typical level of coverage achieved within district health authority areas for cancer screening and immunisation; and what information he has on preventive health performance in other European Community countries.

Mr. Mellor: For cervical cancer screening, the information is not available in the form requested. Following the introduction of a new statistical return from April 1988, it is hoped to be able to give details of levels of coverage for 1988-89 towards the end of this year. Similarly, following the introduction of a new statistical return for breast cancer screening from April 1989, it is hoped to be able to give details of levels of coverage achieved in 1989-90 towards the end of 1990.

The United Kingdom is the first country in the European Community to implement nationwide cervical cancer screening based on computerised call and recall. The United Kingdom and the Netherlands are currently implementing similar programmes for breast cancer screening.

On immunisation, the coverage for England in 1987-88 (the latest year available) averaged 87 per cent. for diphtheria, tetanus and polio, 76 per cent. for measles and 73 per cent. for whooping cough. In that year nearly 100 of the English health authorities exceeded 90 per cent. for diphtheria, tetanus and polio, and eight also exceeded that figure for measles.

Although European Community countries make immunisation uptake data available to the World Health Organisation, only the United Kingdom and the Netherlands use similar calculations to derive uptake. It is not therefore possible to make accurate comparisons.

Grading

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what administrative costs have so far been incurred at district health authority level in dealing with appeals made in accordance with section 32 of the General Whitley Council handbook against the imposition of particular grades under the new clinical grading structure;

(2) what are the projected costs of dealing with appeals made in accordance with section 32 of the General Whitley Council handbook against the imposition of particular grades under the new clinical grading structure made at district, regional and national levels;

(3) what extra funds have been set aside to meet the administrative costs of appeals made in accordance with section 32 of the General Whitley Council handbook against the imposition of particular grades under the new clinical grading structure at district, regional and national levels.

Mr. Mellor: Detailed information about health authorities' particular administrative expenditure is not held centrally and to obtain it would incur disproportionate cost.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether, in view of the number of clinical grading appeals from nurses, he will instruct Health Service managers to return to the negotiating table to resolve the dispute over the interpretation of the clinical grading criteria of continuing responsibility and supervision.

Mr. Mellor: I understand that these issues were discussed at length in the nursing and midwifery staffs negotiating council last year without agreement being reached between the staff and management sides. We share the vew of the management side that further discussions would not now be a helpful way forward, since the prospect of reaching agreement has not improved.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what additional funding has been made available by the Government to date in respect of successful nurse grading appeals.

Mr. Mellor: In 1988-89 the Government made available to health authorities in England additional funding of £731 million to meet the cost of the nurses pay and regrading exercise. This figure, which was based on health authorities' own estimates, includes the further £98 million announced in October 1988 to meet in full the final cost of the clinical regrading exercise. The total sum has been rolled forward to 1989-90 and this together with the substantial real terms increase in resources announced in the 1988 Autumn Statement provides authorities with sufficient resources to plan flexibly to meet the cost of successful appeals.

Ambulance Services (Privatisation)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South of 20 October, Official Report, column 270, what authority, option, or instruction has been given by him relating to the privatisation, or sub-contracting, of any non-emergency ambulance service in England and Wales.

Mr. Freeman: There are no plans to privatise the ambulance service.

Health authorities are responsible for the operational management of the ambulance service. In 1984 the Department published a scrutiny report on the non-emergency sector of the ambulance service when we said that it was open to district health authorities to buy-in part of the ambulance service from the private sector if that is more cost effective and provided the quality of service was maintained. Many NHS ambulance authorities already use private contractors, the hospital car service and voluntary aid societies to transport appropriate NHS patients. This has been the case for many years and helps to ensure that skilled ambulance crews and specialist vehicles are used for those who need the special care and attention which they can provide.

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library a full copy of the research commissioned by the committee for monitoring agreements on tobacco advertising and sponsorship into compliance with the agreements on advertising and sponsorship between the Government and the tobacco industry.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 28 July 1989]: My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health wrote to the hon. Member on 27 September to explain that the independent Committee for Monitoring Agreements on Advertising and Sponsorship (COMATAS) had been consulted about this matter, and that the tobacco industry had objected to the release of this material on various grounds.

This matter has been pursued with the industry's representatives with the aim of securing the release of this material but they remain of the view that the research reports should not be made public. They argue that the business of COMATAS is private and confidential to the committee and that the research in question was not intended to be free-standing. They insist also that the reports contain commercially sensitive information.

This matter was discussed at a COMATAS meeting on Thursday 5 October. The independent chairman, Sir Peter Lazarus, concluded that since COMATAS is a joint committee consisting of equal representation from the industry and from Government, if one party insisted that the research reports should not be released, this view should prevail. The committee accepted this position.

The results of the research projects commissioned by COMATAS are reported in the first and second annual reports of the committee, published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office (ISBNs 0 11 321138 4 and 0 11 321225 9), both of which are in the Library.

GPs (Contracts)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether, in the 1990 contract (a) "The Public Service" includes schools which have opted out from local education authority control, local education authority schools and further education colleges, (b) in paragraph 13(a) the £400,000 fund is annually refreshed by that amount and for post-graduate teaching only, (c) the definition of sparsely populated areas in paragraph 13(b) is altered; and (d) to qualify under paragraph 26 a general practitioner must be qualified to perform all operations on the list of surgical procedures.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: The National Health Service (General Medical and Pharmaceutical Services) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1989, laid on 16 October, set out the criteria by which FPCs should determine applications from GPs to work over four instead of five days a week. It will therefore be for the FPC to decide whether the provision of health care services to local education authority schools and further education colleges, whether opted out or not, may justify a GP providing general medical services over four rather than five days. The fund of up to £400,000 a year is recurrent, and will mainly be directed at undergraduate teaching. As regards "sparsely populated areas", no change is being made to the inducement practice scheme. To qualify for inclusion on the minor surgery list, a doctor must demonstrate competence to undertake all the procedures listed in schedule 1B of the amending regulations.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether, in the 1990 contract (a) the paragraph 51 general practitioner age limits apply to locums and assistant doctors, (b) time spent by general practitioners on representational work on official bodies can be subtracted from the 26 hours, referred to in paragraph A2, (c) the substantial extra resources referred to in paragraph 58 means resources new to the National Health Service, or resources reallocated within it and (d) proof of posting an offer, paragraph A7 will constitute offering the required services to a post-75 patient; and who bears the cost of paragraph A13 reports.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 October 1989]: Locums and assistant doctors who are not included in an FPC medical list are not affected by the introduction of a compulsory retirement age. Under the revised terms of service, a doctor will be required to be available to his patients for at least 26 hours over five days a week at times convenient to patients. Provision is made for an FPC to agree that a GP may fulfil this requirement over four instead of five days, provided the GP satisfies the criteria set out in the National Health Service (General Medical and Pharmaceutical Services) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1989.

Because a number of fees and allowances will be abolished, it will be necessary to redistribute a considerable proportion of the funds currently expended on general medical services to meet the costs of new payments. The reference to "substantial extra resources" in paragraph 2.6 of the White Paper "Promoting Better Health" and quoted in paragraph 58 of "The 1990 Contracts" referred to extra investments additional to current expenditure. Where a GP makes an offer in writing to a patient aged 75 or over under paragraph 13D of the revised terms of service, proof of posting the written offer will be accepted as discharging the responsibility to make such an offer. Should the patient accept the offer, the GP will be required to carry out the check-up as laid down in those terms of service.

The production of annual reports by practices will not be a significant expense and, as with other expenses related to the provision of general medical services, will be reimbursed to the profession indirectly through fees and allowances.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Marriage Allowance

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what arrangements he has made for the allocation of the marriage allowance following the introduction of separate taxation; and what measures he will take to ensure that the marriage allowance is shared equally between husband and wife.

Mr. Lilley: The married couple's allowance which will be introduced under independent taxation in April 1990 will be given in the first instance to the husband. If he has insufficient income to use part or all of the allowance himself he will be able to transfer the surplus to his wife. Allowing married couples generally to share the married couple's allowance between them would add considerably to the complexity of independent taxation and would delay its introduction. Fewer than one in 300 couples would gain any financial advantage from this additional complexity.

DRG plc

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the use by Pembridge Investments of Bermuda of that off-shore tax haven to launch a takeover bid for the Bristol-based company DRG plc and the fact that the tax status of Pembridge Investments would allow it to break up the constituent parts of DRG and sell them free of tax at the corporate level; whether he will be considering legislation to bring the United Kingdom into line with the tax regime as it operates in this respect elsewhere in Europe; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: I cannot comment on the tax aspects of individual takeover bids, but I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Central Statistical Office

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is proposing any change to the Central Statistical Office's cash limits for 1989-90.

Mr. Lilley: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class XIX, vote 18 will be increased by £1,615,000, from £13,727,000 to £15,342,000 and the running cost limit by £1,163,000, from £10,804,000 to £11,967,000. Part of the increase reflects further transfers of provision from other Departments following the establishment of the Central Statistical Office as a separate Department: corresponding reductions will be included in supplementary estimates for the Cabinet Office: other services (class XX, vote 2), the Department of Trade and Industry (class V, vote 3) and the Department of Employment (class VII, vote 2). The remainder reflects provision to meet some of the additional administrative and other expenditure which arises for the Central Statistical Office as a separate Department, and to meet expenditure on a share register survey in connection with the Department's work to improve the quality of the national accounts' statistics. These elements (totalling £695,000) will be charged to the Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police (Supermarket Sites)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the proposed deals with supermarket chains to build on sites owned by the Metropolitan police in return for providing a free police station; and what other police forces in England and Wales are considering these proposals.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We are prepared to consider proposals for new police stations submitted by police authorities in collaboration with the private sector, provided these offer better value for money than schemes which are totally publicly funded.

I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the Metropolitan police are not at present considering any such scheme. I understand, however, that South Yorkshire police authority is doing so; we are not aware that any other police authority in England and Wales is in a similar position.

Prison Sentences

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what sentence, with full remission; results in (a) post-sentence or (b) a total period of imprisonment of four years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: A sentence of six years imprisonment (with maximum remission but without parole) will result in a total period of four years being served in custody. The total period spent in custody, whether before or after sentence, earns remission. Thus, the length of sentence requiring four years to be served after sentence depends on the amount of pre-sentence detention.

Leicester (Visits)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the numbers and names of organisations invited to meet Mr. Colin Harnett and Mr. Satish Malik when they visited Leicester in October;

(2) if he will place in the Library a copy of the notes taken by his officials during the visit of Mr. Colin Harnett and Mr. Satish Malik to Leicester in October;

(3) what was the cost to the taxpayer of the visit to Leicester in October of Mr. Colin Harnett and Mr. Satish Malik; what was the purpose of the visit; what was the number of organisations attending the meetings; and on what date hon. Members for Leicester were informed of the visit;

(4) whether Mr. Colin Harnett and Mr. Satish Malik during their visit to Leicester in October 1989, sought the views of the public concerning (a) the Salman Rushdie affair (b) the effectiveness of hon. Members for Leicester in representing their constituents and (c) the police;

(5) which officials from his Department visited Leicester during October; and on what date.

Mr. John Patten: As part of their normal duties (which include visits to all parts of the country), officials from the equal opportunities and general department make occasional visits to regional areas of the Commission for Racial Equality in order to improve their awareness of local community relations. On 17 and 18 October 1989, Mr. Colin Harnett, Mr. Satish Malik and Miss Pamela Johnson made such a visit to the commission's Leicester office. They were joined for the first day only by Mr. Stephen Rimmer of the police department.

At the request of the Home Office, the arrangements for the visit were made locally by the commission for Racial Equality and comprised meetings with the commission's staff, the officers and members of the Leicester Council for Racial Justice, officers of Nottingham and Wellingborough community relations councils, and separately with individual members of the Muslim communities. In additon the police arranged a meeting with the deputy chief constable of the Leicestershire constabulary and some of his officers, also attended by officers of the commission and Leicester Council for Racial Equality.

Discussions at these meetings covered a broad range of community relations issues at both national and local level. These included the impact of the issue surrounding the publication of the book "The Satanic Verses" and the relations between the police and the ethnic minority communities. I am informed that views about the effectiveness of hon. Members for Leicester were not sought at any time.

It would be neither necessary nor appropriate to inform hon. Members in advance of visits by officials in pursuance of their duties and this was not done in this instance. There will be no official report of the visit, which cost £360·80 in officials' expenses. Information on visits made by other officials from this Department to Leicester during October is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Citizenship

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current backlog of naturalisation cases.

Mr. Renton: The number of applications for naturalisation outstanding at 16 October 1989 was 69,139.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current number of outstanding applications for registration for citizenship.

Mr. Renton: The number of applications for registration of all types outstanding at the end of September 1989 was 70,858.

Drugs

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action his Department is taking over crack; how many seizures have been reported to date; what social background persons successfully prosecuted for using or handling this drug have come from; and if he is planning a prevention advertising campaign in the near future.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We already have a comprehensive programme of action in place to tackle both the supply of and the demand for drugs. Many of the measures being taken or planned, will have an impact on the misuse of cocaine in the form known as crack. These include:

provision of drug-related assistance to Latin American countries, including a substantial package of training and equipment for Colombia; specialist customs teams to combat cocaine smuggling;

the stepping up of police action against the supply of crack and the provision of a fact sheet on crack for drug education co-ordinators in every local education authority.

Some 75 seizures of crack were reported in the first nine months of 1989. Information is not available about the social background of persons prosecuted for offences involving crack.

The ministerial group on the misuse of drugs is considering plans for the next phase of the national drug misuse prevention campaign, which will be aimed at the misuse of all drugs. In addition my right hon. Friend the Member for Whitney (Mr. Hurd) recently announced plans for nine local drug prevention teams which will operate within the community and will help to prevent the spread of the misuse of drugs, including crack.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to publish research commissioned by his Department, on the amount of crime committed to finance drug addiction.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is usual practice for the authors of research commissioned by the Home Office to publish their findings. A summary of recent research on the links between drug misuse and crime was published in the Home Office Research Bulletin No. 26 (pp 30-33) on 8 May 1989. A copy was placed in the Library.

London Fire Brigade

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek a report from Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire brigades on the closure of the London fire control office at Stratford.

Mr. John Patten: Her Majesty's chief inspector of fire services is aware of the decision of the chief fire officer to close the Stratford control room and is monitoring the situation.

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received any representations about the morale of officers of the control offices of the London fire brigade.

Mr. John Patten: Her Majesty's chief inspector of fire services has received a copy of an unsigned note purporting to have been written by London fire brigade control room staff.

Sex Offences

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to why the Metropolitan police have withdrawn from joint arrangements with Southwark and Islington councils to provide rape suites in these boroughs.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner that a new examination suite for rape victims has just been opened in Copenhagen street, Islington. Premises offered by Southwark borough council were not considered to be in a suitable location and there are plans instead to use accommodation adjacent to Carter street police station when rebuilding takes place.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to increase the number of specialist units providing treatment for sex offenders in prison.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no present plans to do so. The research referred to in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) on 4 May 1989 at columns 231-32 will, when the results are available, facilitate an assessment of the current provision of help for sex offenders in prison.

Police Recruitment

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide figures for the numbers of applicants who sat the police initial recruitment examinations in the Metropolitan police district in 1986, 1987 and 1988 broken down separately for white and black applicants.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the relevant information is as follows:

Year	White Candidates	Black and Asian Candidates	Total
1986	1,884	179	2,063
1987	1,859	228	2,087
1988	2,306	127	2,433

Suicides

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he intends to take with regard to the youth remand wing at Leeds prison, following the publication of the report on teenage suicides at the prison by the Howard League for Penal Reform.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We are studying the report. It has yet to be decided whether any of its recommendations should be pursued.

Forensic Science Laboratory

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to improve the pay and conditions of forensic scientists to tackle the shortage of staff at the Metropolitan police forensic science laboratory.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand that the Metropolitan police are looking at the case for pay improvements for staff in their forensic science laboratory. We will consider any case as soon as it is submitted.

Whatton Young Offender Institution

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide information on staffing cover at Whatton young offender institution between 1 October 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Total staff in post at Whatton at 1 October 1988 numbered 112, of whom 63 were officers (including senior and principal officers). At 1 October 1989 there were 116, of whom 65 were officers. Between these dates, total staffing levels varied between 111 and 118 and officer levels between 62 and 68.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what action he is taking to tackle bullying and intimidation amongst inmates at Whatton young offender institution;

(2) what preparation and training has been given to staff at Whatton young offender institution to help them to cope with the increasing number of juveniles serving longer sentences and with previous convictions who have been allocated to Whatton since October 1988.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Following the introduction of the unified custodial sentence for young offenders last October, Whatton young offender institution now holds young adults aged 17 to 20 serving sentences of up to four months and juvenile offenders serving sentences of up to 12 months and there have been some control problems asociated with this population.

Regional staff have been working closely with the governor and his staff to develop the regime at Whatton. All staff have already been given training in communications, dealing with difficult inmates and resolving conflict. Further guidance on dealing with particular problems associated with the management and control of sentenced juvenile offenders is planned.

Violence and bullying in prison service establishments is regarded very seriously and every effort is made to combat it. Converting dormitory into cubicle accommodation can assist and three dormitories at Whatton have recently been converted.

Crime Screening

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department is undertaking research into crime screening.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The current Home Office research programme includes a study of detective work. The future direction of the study depends on the outcome of preliminary work, but it may well include an investigation into crime screening. Although the introduction and evaluation of crime screening in police forces is an operational matter for chief officers, its use is also examined by Her Majesty's inspectors of constabulary in their annual inspections.

Westerglen Transmission Station

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how much public money has been spent on adapting the BBC Westerglen transmission station, Falkirk, for possible use in the event of a nuclear war; and where the money came from;

(2) what communications he has had with the BBC about the possible use of the Westerglen transmission station, Falkirk, in the event of a nuclear war;

(3) what efforts were made by his Department to assess local opinion regarding the adaptation of the Westerglen transmission station, Falkirk, for possible use in the event of a nuclear war;

(4) whether he will make a statement giving the details of, and the justification for, the adaptation of the Westerglen transmission station, Falkirk, for possible use in the event of a nuclear war.

Mr. Renton: Planning permission has been obtained from Falkirk district council to build limited emergency facilities at the Westerglen transmitter site and work is expected to begin shortly. Such facilities attract Government grant, but it is not the practice to disclose details in individual cases.

I understand that the building work currently being undertaken at the site is to refurbish and upgrade the existing transmitting facilities as part of the BBC's ongoing maintenance programme.

Lance Corporal Clive Shorters

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of the judgment in the case of Lance Corporal Clive Shorters, convicted at Stafford crown court on 14 September 1989 on two counts of arson, he will ask the Falklands Islands Government to reopen the inquiry into the fire at the King Edward Memorial Hospital at Port Stanley in 1984.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have been asked to reply.

The Falkland Islands police force, the Royal Military Police and Staffordshire CID have just completed a further investigation of the incidents leading to the death of eight people in the fire at King Edward the Seventh Memorial Hospital, Port Stanley, in April 1984. Many witnesses, including Mr. Shorters, have been re-interviewed.

Once they have considered the results of this investigation, the authorities in Port Stanley will consider whether any further steps should be taken in the Falkland Islands in relation to the fire.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of letters from hon. Members to his Department received a reply (a) in under four weeks, (b) within four to six weeks, (c) within six to eight weeks and (d) over eight weeks, in each of the last three years.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Soviet Union

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations have been made to the Russian authorities about the case of Moisey Issakovich Volfenson and Maya Issakovna Luthzkaya, their daughter Elena Moiseevna Volfenson and mother Manya Genehovna Lutzkaya of Kiev;

(2) what representations have been made to the Russian authorities about the case of Roman and Larissa Litovsky and their children Kosya and Sasha of Kiev.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have not previously raised these particular cases with the Soviet authorities, but we shall be happy to do so if the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) will provide the necessary details about each case.

British Embassy, Brussels

Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied that the developer-built premises leased outside the traditional diplomatic district of Brussels as the new British embassy are of the style, quality, location and construction appropriate for a leading member of the European Community.

Mr. Sainsbury: Her Majesty's proposed new embassy building in Brussels is in an acceptable location being in the same prime diplomatic area as the present embassy. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office is in negotiation with the agents for the building and expect to have available shortly full details about the quality of materials and the standard of construction. These aspects will be investigated fully before a legally binding agreement is signed.

Kurds

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the governments of Iran, Iraq, Syria and Turkey concerning the treatment of Kurdish people; how often prisons and refugee camps for Kurdish people have been visited by representatives of Her Majesty's Government since January; and what meetings have been held with Kurdish organisations.

Mr. Waldegrave: The question of human rights and particularly the Kurds has recently been raised with the Turkish Government, who claimed that efforts to solve remaining problems would continue. Members of Her Majesty's embassy in Ankara have visited all three refugee camps since January. Her Majesty's embassy maintains contacts with representatives of a wide political spectrum in Turkey.

We regularly make clear to the Iraqi Government our concerns about Iraq's human rights record. We have no diplomatic relations with Iran or Syria and have made no direct representations to them, but we continue to make our views on human rights known to those Governments by our statements at international meetings.

Angola

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what recent occasions he has met Dr. Jonas Savimbi of the Angolan UNITA movement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met Dr. Savimbi on 13 October during his recent private visit to Britain. He was accompanied by myself and by FCO officials. We stressed to Dr. Savimbi the urgent need to restore the ceasefire in Angola and to resume negotiations with the Angolan Government without preconditions.

Vietnamese Refugees (Hong Kong)

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the position of refugees in Hong Kong and the compulsory repatriation of people to Vietnam.

Mr. Maude: There are about 13,000 Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong whom resettlement countries have pledged to resettle within three years. Those who have been determined not to be refugees have no prospect of resettlement and, as agreed by the Geneva conference in June, should return to their country of origin. Repatriation is an internationally accepted method for dealing with illegal immigrants. There is no reason why it should not apply to Vietnamese.

Commonwealth States

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many member states of the Commonwealth are multi-party democracies.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Commonwealth consists of 49 independent sovereign states, of which 33 are multi-party democracies and six whose parliaments consist of elected independent members.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Pyrford School

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to make a decision that will enable a head teacher to be appointed at Pyrford county first school.

Mr. Alan Howarth: A decision has been made and the interested parties have been informed.

Cash Limits

Mr. Couchman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give details of any revised cash limits for his Department's votes.

Mr. MacGregor: Subject to parliamentary approval to the necessary Supplementary Estimates, cash limits for the following votes will be revised as follows:

Class and vote	Current cash limit £	Change £	Revised cash limit £
XXIII.1	494,136,000	+2,777,000	496,913,000
XII.2	3,123,761,000	+1,026,000	3,124,787,000
XII.4	73,477,000	+3,420,000	76,897,000

The whole of the increases on Class XII, Votes 1 and 2 and £177,000 of the increase on Class XII, Vote 4 are attributable to permitted carry-forward of capital underspends. My Department's overall entitlement to carry-forward under the end-year flexibility scheme was announced by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 20 July 1989 (Official Report, columns 257-62). The carry-forward on Class XII, Vote 1 is £635,000 less than the entitlement of £3,412,000 and the carry-forward on Class XII, Vote 2 is £635,000 greater than the entitlement of £391,000. There is therefore no change in the overall amount of end-year flexibility carry-over from that announced by the Chief Secretary on 20 July, but its distribution is different. This is because services formerly borne on Class XII, Vote 1 in 1988-89 are now borne on Class XII, Vote 2 in 1989-90.

The balance of the increase on Class XII, Vote 4 of £3,243,000 is for initial expenditure on the provision of a new headquarters building in Westminster for my Department.

These increases will be charged to the Reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

EC Education Council

Mr. John Marshall: To ask he Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the outcome of the meeting of Education Ministers in Luxembourg on 6 October.

Mr. MacGregor: Together with the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), I attended a Council meeting of the European Community Education Ministers on 6 October. We discussed the Commission communication on guidelines for the medium term in the sphere of education and training and agreed conclusions on co-operation and Community policy in this area in the run up to 1993. These conclusions identify objectives shared by member states as a basis for future co-operation activities. A point of particular concern to us was that the conclusions recognise that future co-operation must have special regard to the principles that the fundamental powers in matters of general education policy lie with member states, that Community action should be subsidiary to action by member states and only undertaken where it can usefully complement it, and that linguistic and cultural diversity should be respected.

Ministers agreed to encourage initiatives related to the development of national youth cards and on the co-ordination of national experiments in the public or private sector which might lead eventually to a European youth card.

Ministers also discussed Community co-operation in technical and vocational education and proposals to combat failure at school. The Commission gave presentations on the European Schools and the extension to individual EFTA countries of participation in the COMETT programme of co-operation between higher education and industry in technology training.

TRANSPORT

Railway Infrastructure

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what considerations he takes into account, when approving or applying for permission to initiate smaller scale schemes of capital improvements to railway infrastructure, not subject to the investment return criteria normally imposed.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail submits certain schemes over £10 million for infrastructure or rolling stock to my right hon. Friend for authorisation. Smaller schemes are approved by British Rail. Schemes are currently appraised using an 8 per cent. discount rate, and we expect to approve schemes which either:

(i) earn a commercial return;
(ii) represent the most cost-effective way of continuing to provide grant-aided services to the agreed quality standards;
(iii) will be worth while because the cost will be less than the revenues to be earned from passengers and the benefits to non-users, eg in relief of road congestion;
(iv) offer land development advantages, where beneficiaries may be expected to make an appropriate contribution to costs.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the likely running times in minutes of trains from Brussels, Lille, and Paris to the Cheriton portal of the Channel tunnel, using the fastest routes now authorised and the approximate running times likely from thence to Manchester, Leicester, and Doncaster using (i) existing routes and short new links and (ii) a high speed link from Cheriton to London; and what is his estimate of effect of routing in London via White City and/or Stratford, instead of King's Cross.

Mr. Portillo: British Rail predicts that in 1993 the journey times for through passenger services from the Channel tunnel portal at Cheriton will be one hour 50 minutes to both Paris and Brussels, and 50 minutes to Lille. Some 20 minutes will be saved on the journey time to Brussels with the completion of the new line in Belgium now expected in 1995. The journey time from Cheriton to Manchester will be four hours 25 minutes and three hours 55 minutes to Doncaster. No direct passenger service to Leicester will be technically feasible. With the completion of a new line between Cheriton and London King's Cross, BR expect that passenger services to Manchester would take three hours 55 minutes and Doncaster two hours 55 minutes. The difference in journey time if the through services were to be routed via a new line to Stratford would not be great. BR estimates that, depending on the destination, around six to 10 minutes would be added to journeys. BR considers that the main point about King's Cross is that it would be a far more convenient interchange for passengers from the North and Midlands wishing to connect with the high frequency international services starting in London.

ENERGY

Severn Barrage

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the amount of public money, other than on essential site-specific environmental work referred to in his answer of 23 October, to be expended on the proposed Severn barrage.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Before a Severn tidal barrage could go ahead, a full environmental impact assessment would need to be carried out over several years. This could cost about £10 to £15 million.

Over the next two years only essential work on the Severn barrage will be undertaken. This will include:

some site-specific environmental work;
a study of the organisation and financing issues for a barrage.

The work to be undertaken immediately is under discussion with the Severn tidal power group in the light of its recent report.

The Department will also be funding generic tidal research and development in support of site-specific work on the Severn, Mersey and other estuaries. This work mainly addresses environmental issues. The total cost of generic environmental studies completed since 1986 and currently under way amounts to £1 million.

International Atomic Energy Agency Budget

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what contribution has been made by the United Kingdom to the International Atomic Energy Agency annual operating budget for 1990; what proportion of the total budget this constitutes; and what was the basis on which the United Kingdom contribution was calculated.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The United Kingdom's subscription to the International Atomic Energy Agency's 1990 regular budget will be $7·7 million, equivalent to 4·99 per cent. This subscription will be paid in the financial year 1990-91. The assessment on member states is based on the United Nations formula for the scale of contributions, adjusted to take account of the safeguards and non-safeguards components of the budget.

Magnox Power Stations

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what estimates his Department had in June from the Central Electricity Generating Board for the remaining operational life for each of the Magnox power stations.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave him on 23 October at column 296.

WALES

Housing Revenue Accident Subsidy

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will consult representatives of local government and relevant professional and other bodies on his determination under part VI of the Local Government and Housing Bill of housing revenue account subsidy for 1990-91; and what proposals he will be making.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Department is today sending local housing authorities in Wales, the Council of Welsh Districts and other interested bodies, consultation papers on the proposed new housing revenue account subsidy. The papers contain my detailed proposals for a method of calculating the new subsidy for which the Local Government and Housing Bill makes provision. They also include details of the guideline rents, and of the allowances for expenditure on management and maintenance which we propose to take into account in calculating each authority's entitlement to subsidy in 1990-91.

Comments are invited within six weeks. I am putting a copy of the consultation papers in the Library together with a list of the guidelines proposed for each authority. For the rent guideline, taking into account prevailing rent levels in Wales, I propose to assume next year an average rent increase of two per cent. above the allowance for inflation.

I also propose to use the provisions in part VI of the Bill to allow the aggregate notional rental income for Wales to be apportioned between housing authorities by reference to variations in the aggregate values of local authority dwellings. This leads to different guideline rents for different authorities. A set of rules to limit changes ensures that no guideline rent would represent an increase of more than £4·50 a week over the average rent in any authority this year and permits, at the lower end of the scale, guideline increases which are restricted to the allowance for inflation over an authority's existing rent level.

The proposals represent a balanced approach to the establishment of sensible levels of rents in different parts of the Principality.

For the management and maintenance expenditure guideline, I propose to assume a 3 per cent. growth per dwelling above the allowance for inflation next year for each housing authority in Wales.

The guidelines both for rent and for management and maintenance spending are no more than the assumptions my Department will make in calculating subsidy. Each council will have to decide for itself what level of rents it sets and how much it spends on managing and maintaining its stock.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will decide the future of the community health councils in Wales; if he will give three months consultation period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: We intend to issue very shortly a consultation document on the proposal that there should be one community health council for each DHA area. It is our intention to allow a three month period for comment and decisions on the future community health council structure in Wales will be taken as quickly as possible thereafter.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Cash Limits

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether any changes will be made to his Department's cash limits and running costs limit for 1989-90.

Mr. Ridley: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the cash limit for class V, vote 3 (administration, regulation of domestic trade and industry, and consumer protection) will be increased by £4,951,000 from £243,230,000 to £248,181,000. The increase covers provision of £3,500,000 for the acquisition of a site in Teddington for the National Physical Laboratory (offset by a corresponding reduction in class V, vote 2), and reflects the take-up of entitlement to carry forward provision for an underspending in 1988-89 under the end-year flexibility arrangements as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 20 July 1989. The full entitlements of £813,000 on capital expenditure and £1,251,000 on running costs are taken up. These increases are partially offset by a net transfer of £613,000 to the Central Statistical Office (CSO) (Class XIX Vote 18) in respect of staff recently transferred to the CSO. As a result of these changes, the running cost limit for the department has been increased by £338,000 from £304,760,000 to £305,098,000. The net effect of these changes will be charged to the Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

The cash limit for class V, vote 2 (support for industry) will be reduced by £7,800,000 from £578,637,000 to £570,837,000. This reduction reflects the offset for the increase of £3,500,000 on class V, vote 3 in respect of the Teddington acquisition: it also covers a reduction of £4,000,000 to reflect the transfer of responsibility for city action teams to the Department of the Environment class V, vote 3, and a reduction of £300,000 to reflect the transfer of responsibility for the Government's contribution to a rent subsidy for the international sugar and wheat organisations to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food class IV, vote 4.

SCOTLAND

Strathclyde Structure Plan

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the staffing consequences in planning authorities of the proposed quarterly roll-on of private sector housing demand contained in his draft decision letter on the Strathclyde structure plan 1988 update.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A number of planning authorities have commented on this issue in responding to my right hon. and learned Friend's draft modifications, and he will take these comments into account in reaching his decision.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what effect his proposed modifications to the 1988 update of the Strathclyde structure plan 1986 update will be on the green belt, particularly in relation to the evidence submitted to the relevant district councils and the Strathclyde regional liaison committee on housing land targets.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Adjustments of green belt boundaries would only be needed if sufficient suitable sites could not be found elsewhere. It would be for the planning authorities, in consultation with the housebuilders, to find suitable sites. My right hon. and learned Friend will take all objections to his draft modifications into account in reaching his decision on the update.

Crinan Old Harbour

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding the proposed housing development at Crinan old harbour; and what action he intends to take.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has received 10 representations about this proposed development. Responsibility for planning matters generally rests with the planning authority, in this case Argyll and Bute district council. It is not the intention of my right hon. and learned Friend to intervene in this matter.

Lennox Castle Hospital

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many full-time and part-time dentists are employed to provide for the needs of patients resident in Lennox Castle hospital; and how many full-day and half-sessions each of these categories of dentists undertook each year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Three dentists are contracted by Greater Glasgow health board to undertake one half-day session each per week at Lennox Castle hospital. Eighty-six sessions have so far been undertaken this year, plus 15 theatres sessions for oral surgery.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients are currently resident in Lennox Castle hospital.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The answer is 795.

Official Transport

Mr. Harry Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what costs have been incurred since July for transport for, and on how many occasions such transport was used by, hon. Members on non-ministerial duties; and for what reasons.

Mr. Rifkind: Transport is provided and used by Scottish Office Ministers solely to facilitate the efficient conduct of their ministerial duties.

Scottish Office Background Papers

Mr. Harry Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what provisions are made for Scottish Office civil servants to copy to hon. Members all background papers and policy proposals arising from such background papers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: None.

Lothian Health Board

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied that the management and purchasing of supplies by Lothian health board is being conducted in a proper manner.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 26 October 1989]: This is primarily a matter for the board, which is required under guidance issued by the Scottish Home and Health Department to draw up standing instructions to cover all financial matters and to keep them under review. The relevant procedures and controls are subject to egular internal and external audit checks. The Department's Accounting Office has established that the board is currently reviewing these procedures and systems.

Cancer Treatment (Children)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the figures for each Scottish regional health authority for postponement of cancer treatments of children for this year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 26 October 1989]: Postponement of treatment is likely to be for purely medical considerations and the information is not collected centrally.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Regional Fisheries Advisory Committees

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the names of all those so far appointed as members of regional fisheries advisory committees in England and Wales.

Mr. Gummer: Appointments to the regional fisheries advisory committees are made by the National Rivers Authority. Appointments made so far are:

Drift Net Fishing

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had at European Community level concerning action to combat illegal drift net fishing in international waters.

Mr. Gummer: I am aware of the concern about the large-scale drift netting operations for tuna in the southern Pacific ocean. There has been no discussion on this matter at European Community level.

Salmon

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he anticipates that the draft European Community regulations on game meat are likely to be extended to apply to the sale of wild salmon and salmon trout.

Mr. Gummer: No. I understand that it is not the Commission's intention to extend to fish its proposals for a regulation on rabbit and game meat.

The Commission is developing a separate proposal for fish hygiene which would apply to wild salmon and salmon trout.

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will review the membership of his advisory committee on salmon stocks, following the inauguration of the National Rivers Authority.

Mr. Gummer: The initial appointments to the salmon advisory committee were for a three-year term and this expires in November 1989 (chairman) and February 1990 (members). We shall therefore be considering the future membership of the Committee in the coming weeks. Members are appointed on an ad hominem basis, having regard to their own particular knowledge and expertise; they do not represent any particular organisation even though the initial appointments to the committee were drawn from a wide variety of invited nominations from salmon interests.

Eggs

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many eggs produced at the poultry establishment of Our Lady of Passion monastery in Daventry are known to have been contaminated with salmonella in each of the last three years.

Mr. Curry: This information is not available. The Government's measures introduced in March 1989 on compulsory testing for salmonella are directed towards identifying poultry flocks in which invasive salmonella is present, rather than examination of eggs. I understand that the flock in question was not tested in accordance with these legal requirements and the identification of salmonella typhimurium in the flock, on which the decision to slaughter was based, was made following a report from the local authority of a food poisoning outbreak associated with eggs produced at the monastery.

Straw and Stubble Burning

Mr. Hasselhurst: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the 1989 straw survey has been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The 1989 straw survey date was 2 October 1989 and the survey is still in progress. The results of this survey are expected to be published early in December 1989. My right hon. Friend the Minister is currently reviewing the position on straw and stubble burning and will take the results of this year's survey into account.

DEFENCE

Low Flying

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many sorties were authorised to fly at less than 250 ft in the Borders tactical training area on 1 July 1988, 4 to 8 July 1988, 11 to 15 July 1988 and any subsequent dates.

Mr. Neubert: The information on sorties requested is not available, but the number of movements authorised for flying below 250 ft in the Borders tactical training area in July 1988 was 94 and from 1 August 1988 to 31 July 1989 was 1,912. These figures are not directly comparable with earlier movements figures for the Borders tactical training area which pre-date the extension of the area last year.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if flying at less than 250 ft is included in the training syllabus for junior pilots on front-line Royal Air Force strike-attack squadrons.

Mr. Neubert: No. Operational low flying is mainly restricted to essential work-up training for specific exercises in North America and is not included in a general training syllabus.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the effective date and geographical extent of each alteration to the boundaries of the Borders tactical training area since 1979.

Mr. Neubert: I have nothing to add to the letters of my hon. Friend the then Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces of 9 June 1988, 30 June 1988, 5 August 1988 and 30 September 1988 to the hon. Member on this subject.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if interceptor aircraft are permitted to fly at less than 250 ft in the Borders tactical training area; and what is the minimum permitted height and maximum permitted speed for interceptor aircraft during interception manoeuvres within the Borders tactical training area.

Mr. Neubert: There is no requirement for interceptor aircraft to carry out operational low flying training in the United Kingdom. Interceptor aircraft taking part in interception/evasion exercises are authorised to fly no lower than 250 ft minimum separation distance and within the normal speed constraints of the United Kingdom low flying system.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date notification of the disestablishment of the Tees-side low-flying avoidance area was sent by his Department to (a) hon. Members and (b) local authorities in the area; and if he will list the parliamentary constituencies and local authorities concerned.

Mr. Neubert: As the hon. Member will be aware, when significant changes are made to the United Kingdom low flying system hon. Members whose constituencies are affected are given appropriate notification.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration has been given to permitting United States and other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation air forces to fly at less than 250 ft in the three United Kingdom tactical training areas.

Mr. Neubert: There are no records of foreign military aircraft requesting authority to carry out low flying training in the United Kingdom tactical training areas.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to the replies to the hon. Member for Meirionydd Nant Conwy of 9 November 1987, Official Report, columns 36-37, 20 January 1988, Official Report, column 765, and 10 May 1989, Official Report, columns 474-5, on what assumed average number of movements per sortie the figures for low-flying sorties in the years 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988, as recalculated by the pre-1985 method of estimating sorties from numbers of movements, were based; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neubert [pursuant to the reply of 20 July 1989]: The answer is 2·5.

Bombs and Missiles

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a further statement on the possible procurement of a tactical air-to-surface missile;

(2) if he will make a further statement on the procurement options for the possible replacement of the WE177 free-fall nuclear bomb.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) on 24 October.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what expenditure has been incurred to date on the study of procurement options for the possible replacement of the WE177 free-fall nuclear bomb.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave the hon. Member on 17 July 1989 at column 71.

Royal Signals Research Establishment

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Royal Signals research establishment at Malvern was privatised; how much was received for it; who obtained the contract; and what guarantee is in place for the security of sensitive signals and information.

Mr. Neubert: The Royal Signals research establishment at Malvern has not been privatised.

Departmental Land (Hunting)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the policy on his Department's land being used for hunting with hounds; what arrangements are made for service personnel, horses, and equipment to be used in this connection; what requirements and regulations are enforced to try to ensure that hunting does not occur on adjoining landowners' land; what recompense is made if this does occur; and what are the locations of his Department's land where hunting is permitted.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is our policy to permit access to Ministry of Defence land for recreational purposes wherever operational and safety considerations permit, where it is consistent with the interests of our tenants and licensees, and where it does not unreasonably affect local amenities and the environment. Legal activities involving hunting with hounds could be permitted over any MOD land on which those criteria are met.

Although hunting is acknowledged as a useful form of training for both horses and riders, only members of mounted units may be permitted to hunt during duty hours, at their commanding officers' discretion. MOD personnel are entitled to hire various items of Government-owned equipment for their own personal use, subject to availability, and a charge is levied which is calculated to recover any cost to the Department arising from that use.

The question of access to the property of adjacent landowners and of any recompense would be a matter for the hunt itself.

Skyguard

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the height-monitoring radar system Skyguard to begin operating over the transit area that operates over south Yorkshire, Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire; and whether he will report on the results of the monitoring.

Mr. Neubert: It is not the intention to publish proposed deployment locations for the Skyguard radar system in the low flying monitoring role in advance, but my Department will be seeking to ensure a wide spread of locations around the United Kingdom. Appropriate follow-up action will be taken after each deployment.

Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of letters from honourable Members to his Department received a reply (a) in under four weeks, (b) within four to six weeks, (c) within six to eight weeks and (d) over eight weeks, in each of the last three years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I regret that the information is not readily available in the form requested. The aim of all Ministers in the Ministry of Defence is to answer letters from hon. Members within two to four weeks. There are, however, inevitably occasions when this is not possible.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow can expect to receive a response to his letter, dated 11 August, concerning Private W. McLuskey, 1st Battalion, Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend the parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces has written to the hon. Member today.

Pensions

Mr. Thorne: To ask the Scretary of State for Defence if he will give for the latest year for which records exist and for 1974 the number of ladies (a) under 65 years, (b) between 65 and 69 years, (c) between 70 and 79 years and (d) 80 years and over in receipt of attributable forces family pension.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Thorne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what definition his Department uses of war widow for pension purposes.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: "War widow" is not, as such, a defined term used by the Ministry of Defence for pension purposes. However, for purposes of the attributable family pensions which were introduced into the armed forces pension scheme from 31 March 1973, it is a pre-requisite for the award of a widow's pension that her husband died from causes accepted by the Department of Social Security as being attributable to or aggravated by his service.

Explosives and Ammunition

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to review the levels of risk in the storage of conventional military explosives and ammunition.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In accordance with our policy of keeping these matters under regular review, we have decided to put in hand a full study of risk assessment methodology as related to the storage of conventional explosives and ammunition in MOD depots. A contract has been given to the Safety and Reliability Directorate of UKAEA to conduct the review. This contract will be monitored, and further work undertaken, by an MOD team under the guidance of the Explosives Storage and Transport Committee. In addition, all the work in prospect will be scrutinised by an independent panel of experts chaired by Mr. Bryan Harvey, a former Deputy Director-General of the Health and Safety Executive and a former Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Major Hazards. The panel will include representatives from industry, the academic institutions and the Health and Safety Executive. It will report direct to my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces as necessary.

The study is in furtherance of our policy of continuing to update our approach to the safety of explosives and ammunition storage and will draw on the experience of industry as appropriate.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Employment (Strangford)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new jobs have been assisted by the Industrial Development Board and the Local Enterprise Development Unit in the constituency of Strangford in the most recent 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Needham: In the 12-month period to 30 September 1989 the IDB promoted 210 new jobs in the constituency of Strangford. LEDU figures are prepared on a district council basis and in the same period LEDU promoted 93 new jobs in the district council areas of Ards and Castlereagh.

Rural Schools

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will provide additional finance to enable education and library boards to make special provision for small isolated rural schools and small secondary-community schools, particularly in border areas, when the boards are determining future funding for these schools under local management of schools.

Mr. Needham: It is envisaged that local management in schools (LMS) schemes will be able to take account of the needs of small schools—including small isolated rural schools—where there is agreement that such schools must be retained. It is not possible to anticipate at this stage the implications of this for the block grant allocations to boards which are based on relative needs.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many serving members of the Ulster Defence Regiment have been requested to resign because they were deemed to be a security risk due to the area in which they live.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have been asked to reply.

I am aware of none. However, if the hon. Member has a particular case in mind I shall be happy to look into it.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Centre for World Development Education

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any plans to increase Overseas Development Administration support for the Centre for World Development Education.

Mrs. Chalker: I am pleased to announce an increase from £125,000 to £165,000 in the ODA's annual grant to CWDE. This will be for the three years starting 1 April 1990.

Cambodia

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on United Kingdom policy on development aid to Cambodia.

Mrs. Chalker: We do not provide Government-to-Government aid to Cambodia. We have, however, provided £350,000 of humanitarian aid through United Nations agencies for the people of Cambodia, and we are willing to support suitable projects proposed by British non-governmental organisations under our joint funding scheme. Seven such projects have so far been approved involving expenditure of £190,000 from the aid programme.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing (Waltham Forest)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received concerning poor housing conditions in Waltham Forest; what his response was; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I have received a number of representations, including one from the hon. Member, about proposed schemes for the redevelopment of four large panel construction estates in Waltham Forest.

I hope to meet the hon. Member and representatives of the council shortly to discuss these schemes.

Football Spectators Bill

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many letters he has received from members of the public concerning the Football Spectators Bill since the publication of the interim report of Lord Justice Taylor.

Mr. Moynihan: Since the publication on 1 August of Lord Justice Taylor's interim report into the Hillsborough disaster, the Government have received 137 letters about the Football Spectators Bill direct from members of the public, and 26 letters from constituents through their Members of Parliament.

Caravan Sites

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities have made no provisions under the Caravan Sites Act 1968.

Mr. Chope: The information has been placed in the library.

Rivers (Licensed Abstraction)

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will ask the National Rivers Authority to undertake an urgent review of the effect of licensed abstraction on rivers in England and Wales.

Mr. Howard: It will be for the NRA, as an independent body, to decide how best to order its priorities in carrying out its functions under the Water Act 1989. I have, however, drawn my right hon. Friend's question to the authority's attention.

Regional Rivers Advisory Committees

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the names of all those so far appointed as members of regional rivers advisory committees in England and Wales.

Estuarial Barrages

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals for estuarial barrages in England and Wales are currently known to his Department; and what is the present status of each of them.

Mr. Howard: The information requested is as follows:

Barrage and Status
Mersey—Feasibility studies in progress
Severn—A number of studies have been completed
Cardiff Bay—Studies completed—Bill before Parliament
Swansea (River Tawe)—Construction started in 1989
Usk (Newport)—Feasibility studies in progress
Loughor—Feasibility studies completed
Conway—Feasibility studies in progress
Rhyl (River Foryd)—Feasibility studies completed. Scheme shelved.
Tyne Tees—Feasibility studies completed. Bill before Parliament. (Strictly this is a river barrage rather than an estuarial barrage).

Planning Inquiries

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of his current guidance to planning inspectors on their conduct of local public inquiries into planning appeals;

(2) if he will place in the Library a copy of his current instructions to the planning inspectorate as to which planning appeals may be determined by a planning inspectorate without being referred to Ministers.

Mr. Howard: Guidance on the conduct of planning inquiries is contained in chapter B3 of the planning inspectors' handbook. The criteria for recovery of planning appeals for decision by the Secretary of State are set out in paragraph 36 of the "Planning: Appeals, Call-in and Major Public Inquiries—the Government's response to the fifth report from the Evironment Committee, Session 1985-86" (Cm. 43). Both documents are in the Library.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the categories of representations he has received about the payment of the community charge by teachers in residential schools.

Mr. Chope: I have received a number of representations from such teachers about the operation of the standard community charge. Amendments recently made to the Local Government and Housing Bill will enable local authorities to provide relief from the standard charge to teachers who are required to live at their school, as I announced on 9 October.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to make extra funds available to people with severe disabilities, independent of income support criteria, for the purpose of poll tax rebates in regard to major house adaptations; and if he will make a statement with special reference to the Rating (Disabled Persons) Act 1978.

Mr. Chope: Rate relief under the Rating (Disabled Persons) Act 1978 was given to avoid disabled people having to pay more than people in similar property as a result of adaptations which increased the rateable value of their home. There is no question of disabled people having to pay more community charge than their neighbours, and no equivalent relief is therefore necessary. The community charge rebate system will provide extra protection for disabled people, who will be able to qualify for benefit at higher levels of income than people who are not disabled. The Government have announced that there will be special provision for disabled people in the transitional relief scheme.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the administrative implications of his proposals for transitional relief associated with the community charge; and if he will request specific local authorities for their assessment of issues raised by their implementation including the availability of sufficient information.

Mr. Chope: My officials are in discussion with the local authority associations about the administrative implications of the Government's proposals for transitional relief. In addition, we have sent details of the proposals to all authorities and invited them to make representations.

Domestic Waste (Reprocessing)

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about his target of reprocessing an increased proportion of domestic waste by the year 2000.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 20 October 1989]: Waste minimisation and recycling are important in reducing pollution and conserving natural resources. Although the United Kingdom has a good record in certain areas—recycling lead, for example—there is much progress to be made in recycling domestic waste. We shall therefore be working with industry, local authorities and voluntary groups to secure a substantial increase in the proportion of waste being put to productive use with the aim of recycling half our recyclable domestic waste by the end of the century.

The improved controls over waste disposal, on which we hope to legislate shortly, will ensure that the costs of disposal are properly identified and compared with the costs of recycling. We are helping to support Wastewatch and projects such as Recycling City in Sheffield, which is using a range of separation, collection and recycling techniques. We shall also be working with industry to help encourage the market for recycled and recyclable products.

EMPLOYMENT

Employment Training

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the numbers of accidents on YTS, fatal, major and minor, for the latest available three-month period, and how many YTS placements were closed or not accepted in that period and in the three preceeding months.

Mr. Nicholls: Table A provides YTS accident figures for the period 1 July to 30 September 1989.

Table A

	Accidents[1]
Fatalities	Nil
Major injuries[2]	139
Minor injuries	654

Table B provides the closure and non-acceptance figures for the quarters 1 April 1989 to 30 June 1989 and 1 July 1989 to 30 September 1989. These figures are provisional.

Table B

	1 April 1989 to 30 June 1989	1 July 1989 to 30 September 1989
Placements Closed	2	14
Placements not accepted	3	2

[1]Training Agency figures have been compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. However, the Training Agency's figures will include a number of accidents to trainees in educational establishments and road traffic accidents which may not have been reportable to the Health and Safety Executive had the individuals been employed.

[2]Major injuries are classified according to the severity criteria laid down in the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985.

Child Minding

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received concerning the difficulties married women have in enrolling for employment training schemes because they are not entitled to assistance with child minding; and whether he will consider amending the regulations to ensure that assistance is given on the basis of family income and not marital status.

Mr. Nicholls: A number of representations have been received. However, our overall experience of the way the programme is operating does not indicate that married women are being deterred from joining employment training. There are no plans to extend child care payments to groups other than lone parents.

Cash Limits

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether any changes will be made to his Department's cash limits or running costs limits for 1989-90.

Mr. Fowler: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the following changes will be made.

The cash limit on class VII, vote 1 (training programmes) will be reduced by £4,081,000 from £2,623,417,000 to £2,619,336,000. This is the net effect of a token £1,000 vote and a decrease of £4,082,000 partly to offset the increase sought on class VII, vote 2 for National Dock Labour Board administration.

The cash limit on class VII, vote 2 will be increased by £7,078,000 from £633,931,000 to £641,009,000. The increase is offset partly by a £4,081,000 reduction in the cash limit on class VII, vote 1. The increase is the net result of increased provision of £3,018,000 (running costs) and £108,000 (capital costs) under the end-year flexibility arrangements for capital and running costs to carry forward unspent provision from 1988-89 to 1989-90 as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 20 July 1989 (Official Report, cols. 258-62); of £10,000,000 increased provision for certain residual costs of the National Dock Labour Board (partly offset by £5,000,000 reductions elsewhere on vote 2); of the transfer of £919,000 to the Training Agency (class VII, vote 1) in connection with the earlier organisational changes within the Employment Department group which resulted in the Training Agency taking on responsibility for some enterprise and small firms functions; of the transfer of £33,000 to the Central Statistical Office (CSO) (class XIX, vote 18) for certain statistical functions previously transferred to them in the 1989-90 Revised Estimates; and of increased receipts of £96,000 from CSO (class XIX, vote 18) in respect of statistical and administrative support work done by the Department of Employment on a repayment basis.

As a result of these changes there will be an increase of £2,985,000 in the class VII, vote 2 running costs limit which will be increased from £642,144,000 to £645,129,000.

The net effect of these changes will be met from the Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

PRIME MINISTER

Commonwealth Conference

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if she raised the issue of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and the fourth non-proliferation treaty review conference during her attendance at the Commonwealth Conference in Malaysia in October.

The Prime Minister: No.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on discussions she had with other heads of Government and state presidents on the issue of global warming and the threat of sea-level rises, at the Commonwealth summit in Kuala Lumpur.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement that I made yesterday.

Nautical Archaeology

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Prime Minister when she expects that the Departments concerned will be in a position to respond to the recommendations of the report of the Joint Nautical Archaeology Policy Committee; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: A number of Departments have an interest in the matters raised by the report. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has asked his officials to prepare a co-ordinated analysis of how the JNAPC's recommendations bear on individual departments' responsibilities. Ministers will then consider collectively an appropriate response to the recommendations. Work will proceed as quickly as possible.

Cash Limits

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Prime Minister if there are any proposals to change the 1989-90 cash limit and running costs limit for the Cabinet Office: Other Services.

The Prime Minister: Both the overall cash limit and the running costs limit for Cabinet Office: Other Services (class XX, vote 2) have been reduced by £178,000: from £16,639,000 to £16,461,000 and from £18,083,000 to £17,905,000 respectively. These decreases go to offset corresponding increases in the cash limit and running costs limit for the Central Statistical Office (class XIX vote 18) and reflects the transfer of part provision between the Cabinet Office and the Central Statistical Office as a result of the reorganisation of the statistical services which I announced on 5 April 1989.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Widows

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will take immediate steps to amend the Social Security (Overlapping Benefits) Regulations so as to end the present rule whereby a widow, who prior to her husband's death was in receipt of invalid care allowance, has that allowance immediately terminated when she becomes eligible for a widow's pension; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: No. Invalid care allowance and widows benefit are both personal income maintenance benefits, intended to help meet an individual's day-to-day living expenses. To pay invalid care allowance in full in addition to widow's benefit would mean that provision was being made twice from public funds to cover the same needs.

War Widows

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for the latest year for which records exist, how many of those in receipt of a war widows' pension from his Department were also in receipt of (a) housing benefit, (b) income support and (c) other state benefits.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 25 October 1989]: It is estimated that at the end of 1988 about 20 per cent. of war widows were in receipt of housing benefit and about 1 per cent. in receipt of income support. Information is not available on the other state benefits that war widows may receive.

Central Index

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give a breakdown of those categories of persons entitled to make trace and inquiry accesses to his Department's central index; and if he will indicate for what purposes in each case.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There are four facilities currently offered by the central index. These are an inquiry service, the tracing of national insurance numbers (NINOS), the allocation of national insurance numbers and the ability to check on the social security benefits a customer is receiving. All DSS and Employment Department staff who have personal identification devices, without which they cannot access the system, can use the inquiry service. The remaining facilities can be broken down into the following categories:

1. Inquiries only	DSS regional offices (of which only the North West region and Scotland have access to the strategy at present) Support sections at HQ, Lytham-St-Annes Social Security auditors
2. Trace NINOS	Employment Department local offices Employment Department fraud offices Northern Ireland (only certain offices at present)
3. Trace NINOS/ check benefit position	Newcastle Central Office North Fylde Central Office Family Credit Branch Glasgow Social Security Centre
4. Trace NINOS/ check benefit position/ allocate NINOS	Social Security local offices

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Neil Thorne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many claims for unemployment benefit were submitted to his Department by wives of service men stationed (a) in the United Kingdom, (b) in the British Army of the Rhine and (c) elsewhere, for the latest year for which records exist and for the three preceding years;

(2) how many wives of service men were in receipt of unemployment benefit in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) British Army of the Rhine and (c) elsewhere, for the latest year for which records exist and for the three preceding years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is not available.

War Pensions

Mr. Neil Thorne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will specify for the year 1988-89 the amount by which the war pensions vote was overspent or underspent.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: An overspend occurred on the war pensions vote for the year 1988-89 amounting to £2,344,000.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for each year from 1959 to the present day the number of deceased service men whose death was attributable to their service and which resulted in the award of a war widow's pension.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The numbers are as follows. They include all war widows' pensions awarded under war pensions legislation.

	Numbers
1959	1,961
1960	1,964
1961	2,120
1962	2,017

Young People

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many persons aged 16 and 17 years have (a) applied for and (b) been granted crisis loans under the social fund for each of the last 12 months;

(2) how many persons aged 16 and 17 years in receipt of income support have applied for grants or loans from the social fund in each of the past 12 months.

Mr. Scott: I regret that the information is not available.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many persons aged 16 and 17 years have been considered for receipt of income support under the rules for severe hardship (a) prior to and (b) following the changes announced in July;

(2) how many persons aged 16 and 17 years have been refused income support in each of the past 12 months.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The number of applications from 16 and 17-year-olds considered for receipt of income support under the rules for severe hardship in the periods specified are:

	Number	Per cent.
Until 7 July 1989
Granted income support	7,428	65
Refused income support	4,040	35
Total	11,468
From 10 July 1989 to 13 October 1989
Granted income support	3,913	69
Refused income support	1,763	31
Total	5,676

Notes:

1. Based on 100 per cent. count of applications received.
2. Information relates to the number of applications received rather than to the number of individual young people involved. Some individuals may have made more than one application.

The total number of 16 and 17-year-olds who have been refused income support in each of the past 12 months is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many persons aged 16 and 17 years who are living in night shelters or are otherwise homeless have applied for grants, loans or income support in each of the past 12 months.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: This information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department intends to issue further guidance to local offices of the rules governing income support for persons aged 16 and 17 years and the changes made in July.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Following the announcement in March of the improvements to help 16 and 17-year-olds claiming income support, special training was provided for all staff dealing with young people. A number of voluntary organisations were involved in the preparation of the training package, which emphasises the need for sensitivity when dealing with young people who may have been physically or sexually abused. There are standing arrangements for new staff to receive the training.

There is no evidence to suggest that this special training is inadequate but the Government are committed to monitoring the effects of the provisions for young people. If that indicates a need for further guidance, we shall make appropriate arrangements.

Family Credit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families are in receipt of family credit and how many of those families have members on employment training.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest information is for the end of July when the family credit case load was just over 320,000. Precise information is not available about the number of families with members on employment training at the time of the claim for family credit, but indications are that there are likely to be no more than a few hundred.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if his Department has issued, or intends to issue, fresh instructions to offices on the operation of paragraph 11 of schedule 2 to the Family Credit (General) Regulations concerning the disregard of premiums paid to those on employment training;

(2) in how many cases the training premium for employment training has not been disregarded for calculation of family credit entitlement, contrary to paragraph 11, schedule 2 Family Credit (General) Regulations in (a) Cornwall and (b) the rest of Great Britain;

(3) what is the total loss suffered by each individual who has been deprived of part of their family credit entitlement because the premium due to their familes under employment training has not been disregarded.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Instructions about the correct treatment of training premiums were issued to all staff of the family credit unit on 3 May 1989, and the correct disregard should have been applied in all appropriate cases dealt with since that date.

Action is already in hand, using computer records, which will indentify many of the cases dealt with incorrectly before that date. The remainder are cases which cannot be traced in this way and consideration is still being given to what action can be taken to identify them. Until these exercises have been completed, we shall not know the number of cases where the training premium was not disregarded or the amount of the loss suffered by individuals. However, all the indications are that the number of cases is likely to be small.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Immigration Adjudicators

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list all immigration adjudicators showing when they were first appointed and what qualifications they have for the post; and what information is kept on their political affiliations.

The Attorney-General: The names, dates of first appointment and legal professional qualifications of all full-time and part-time immigration adjudicators are listed below. No information is kept on their political affiliations.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General what steps he has taken to ensure the impartiality of immigration adjudicators and to ensure their freedom from pressure from any source to disallow more appeals brought before them; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Immigration adjudicators are appointed by the Lord Chancellor. I have no reason to believe that the immigration adjudicators, who are independent judicial officers, are other than impartial or that they have been subject to any form of pressure to disallow more appeals.

Justices of the Peace (Political Views)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General what is the purpose of question 16 on political views on the form entitled "Particulars of Candidate for Appointment as a Justice of the Peace"; how this information is used; and if he will list for (a) Waltham Forest, (b) London and (c) nationally the number of justices of the peace, broken down by political views where they are known.

The Attorney-General: The purpose of question 16 is to ascertain the political views of a candidate so that the advisory committee can take this into account in its endeavour to bring before the Lord Chancellor a list of recommendations which meets his wish that the composition of each bench should broadly reflect the area it covers. Candidates do not have to answer this question if they do not wish to do so. At the last count the political allegiance of the members of the Waltham Forest bench was as follows:

	Number
Conservatives	36
Labour	26
SLD/SDP (incorporating Liberal and SDP parties)	11
Independent or not known	19

These figures are based on information provided at the time of appointment. Figures for London and England and Wales could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Reciprocal Enforcement Agreements

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General what policy has been formulated with regard to the abduction of children to jurisdictions which do not have reciprocal enforcement agreements with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have been asked to reply.

I am fully aware of the distress that these cases cause to all parties involved.

Where children have been abducted to countries which have ratified the Hague convention on the civil aspects of international child abduction and the European convention on recognition and enforcement of decisions concerning custody of children and on restoration of custody of children, it is open to those concerned to seek the advice of the Lord Chancellor's Department which is the appointed central authority under the terms of the conventions.

In countries where the conventions are not applicable, actions can properly be taken only through the courts of the country concerned. We have no formal standing in what are essentially family matters.

Where children have dual nationality and are in the country of their second nationality, international law prevents us from making formal representations on their behalf. Such children are viewed as being in their own country, and are subject to their own country's law.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 158

SESSION 1988–89

17th October–27th October 1989

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speaker's rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
